"This is quite the most valuable contribution to the large amount of Browning literature hitherto printed or published in England. . . . Taken as a whole, this book—and it is no ordinary undertaking—bears evidence throughout of that courage, patience, knowledge, and research, and, last but not least, that lightness and firmness of hand, which are essential in dealing with the work of a master whose art ranges so high, so deep, and so wide."—J. "His 'skeptics' are not always philosophical sceptics in the sense of deniers, or even doubters, of the possibility of attaining any standard of certainty. Nor are his 'free-thinkers' theological free thinkers, for they include Augustine and the Schoolmen. It would, in fact, be difficult to devise a title capable of defining the entire drift of a book so rich in suggestion of all kinds."—Acad., xx. 229.

Owen, Robert Dale, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1800–1877. During the civil war he took an active part in advocating the emancipation of the slaves, and published letters to the President and members of the cabinet which are said to have had much effect in their deliberations on the subject. Throughout the latter part of his life he was a believer in spiritualism and prominent among its supporters. 1. Beyond the Breakers: Village Life in the West, Phila., 1870, 8vo. (Also entitled "A Story of the Present Day.") 2. The Debatable Land between this World and the Next: with Illustrative Narrations, N. York, 1871, 12mo; 2d ed., 1874.

"Upon the question, On what basis of fact do the alleged spiritual manifestations rest? Mr. Owen has a better right to be patiently heard than many, even than most, other writers who have discussed it. A more dispassionate mind, a more laborious observation, has seldom been brought to the study of the question."—Nation, xv. 269.

3. Threading my Way: Twenty-Seven Years of Autobiography, N. York, 1874, 12mo.

"So far as concerns the frankness of its references to himself and his own affairs, Mr. Owen's book is exceedingly autobiographical, but as regards the matter presented, a very large portion is taken up with an account of his father, Robert Owen, and his grandfather, David Dale. . . . Of such recollections as relate more strictly to Mr. Dale Owen himself, all are readable, most being light, —such as would make pleasant, anecdotical, chatty conversation. Some are more than this."—Nation, xviii. 128.

"A very pleasant little book. The style is simple and fresh, and his memories of early life bring before us some curious scenes from a state of society which already strikes us as very quaint and old-fashioned."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 311.

"It is a series of Black Classics, wherein the color is an accident, the soul human and universal. All that Mr. Page had to do—and he has done it well—was to be a faithful 'recording angel,' to open a sympathetic and retentive ear, to reproduce in firm outlines what every-day life in Virginia abundantly provides, and to clothe the whole in a humorous dialect which is to the psychology what the salt is to the soup."—Critic, viii. 14.

Paget, Miss Violet, ("Vernon Lee," pseud.,) b. 1857; has resided for many years in Italy, making special studies of the history of the art and literature of that country, and contributing largely to leading English periodicals. All her writings have appeared under the above pseudonyme. 1. Studies of the Eighteenth Century in Italy, Lon., 1880, 8vo. (The subjects are: The Arcadian Academy, The Musical Life of Italy, Metastasio and the Opera, The Comedy of Masks, Goldoni, The Venetian Fairy-Comedy of Carlo Gozzi.)

"So well has the mass of material been assimilated that the result, far from being a series of heavy papers redolent of the musty tomes from which they have been gathered, has evolved itself, . . . for the most part, into a number of charming sketches touched in with the light and sure hand of a master."—Spectator, lxi. 361.

2. (Ed.) The Prince of the Hundred Soups, Lon., 1882. 3. Belcaro: being Essays on Sundry Æsthetical Questions, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"There is much in this thoroughly original and delightful book which reminds us of the essays of the eighteenth century. . . It is rare indeed to find so much thought conveyed in so easy a style,—to find a writer who not only has so much that is fresh to say, but has so fresh a way of saying it."—Acad., xxi. 112.

4. Ottilie: an Eighteenth-Century Idyl, Lon., 1883, sq. 16mo.

"The book is just what it pretends to be,—an idyl; a graceful little picture, too slight almost for criticism or detailed analysis, but charming all through."—Acad., xxiii. 448.

5. Euphorion: being Studies of the Antique and the Mediæval in the Renaissance, Lon., 1884, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Its merit is that it is not the compilation of laborious learning, but the direct utterance of an individual mind. Its faults lie in the incessant and undue assertion of this individuality, in confusing impressions with ideas, in a wanton riot of needlessly strong language, and in a harassing and vexatious attempt to overwhelm us with tumultuous description. . . . Vernon Lee has drawn her knowledge of the Italian Renaissance from direct personal contact with its memorials, and her power of sympathetic interpretation has been admirably true. But she has not enjoyed the same advantages in regard to feudalism and asceticism which she is perpetually bringing into comparison with the Renaissance. . . . When she writes about Italian art she is always suggestive and often convincing. When she indulges in historical generalizations she is wayward and even childish."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 317.

6. The Countess of Albany, ("Eminent Women" Ser.,) Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Her style . . . is faulty; she sins from the habit of repetition, and in her eagerness to be forcible she shows no care in her choice of words. Bits of downright slang are thrust into sentences which are otherwise rather high-flown. On the other hand, every page of the book bears witness to the author's ability, to her determination to realize her subject and make her readers realize it."—Ath., No. 2965.

7. Miss Brown: a Novel, Lon., 1884, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

"'Miss Brown' is not only a vivid picture of human life, but also both a severe satire and a tragedy. The subject of the satire is the falseness of the æsthetic ideal, and the tendency of its worshippers to gravitate towards the grossest immorality, while that of the tragedy is the sacrifice, to put it shortly, of a noble character on the altar of gratitude. The difficult themes are treated with great brilliance and originality, and with a literary and imaginative force which demand recognition. It is only to be regretted that both tragedy and satire are extremely and needlessly painful and unpleasant."—Acad., xxvii. 6.

8. Baldwin: being Dialogues on Views and Aspirations, Lon., 1886, 8vo. (The subjects discussed are: The Responsibilities of Unbelief, The Consolations of Belief, Honour and Evolution, Novels, The Value of the Ideal, and Doubts and Pessimism.)

"She is gifted with a large range of interests, a strong desire to see things clearly, and an uncommon turn for exposition, and is also gifted—if we should not rather say handicapped—with an inclination to write upon all sorts of subjects, and a great belief in the power of words to enlighten the hidden recesses of thought. Fluent by nature, she is in danger of becoming voluble by habit. . . . We read the book on and on with continual respect and even admiration for the writer's acuteness, sincerity, and independence of thought, and for her faculty of putting forcibly what she has to say; but it cannot be asserted that the perusal is either delightful in process or wholly satisfactory in result."—Ath., No. 3059.

9. The Phantom Lover: a Fantastic Story, Lon., 1886, cr. 8vo. 10. Juvenilia: being a Second Series of Essays on Sundry Æsthetical Questions, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The essays relate to a theme—that of fine art—which she now regards as more fitted for youthful readers and students than for those of riper years. . . . However this may be, she applies herself with her usual earnestness to the debating of various questions of fine art, and treats them in her accustomed method,—trenchant reasoning, candid, if at times extreme, and brilliant description having a somewhat 'Impressionist' bias, especially where items of colour effect are concerned."—Ath., No. 3119.

General Criticism:

"She is at once subtle and audacious, engagingly frank in proclaiming her likes and dislikes, agreeably discursive, though never wantonly irrelevant, . . . and, finally, able to express her meaning with a literary ease, a wealth of imagery, and a refinement rather than polish of style, which render the perusal of her works an intellectual luxury of a high order."—Spectator, lxi. 143.

"She is in a high degree clever, observant, and keen-witted, and has a great turn for arguing out all kinds of subjects. . . . The writer spins a thread of argument very fine, and at last disposes her readers to discover some reason to the contrary rather than to acquiesce in her leadership."—Ath., No. 3119.

"He resolved in 1852 to make it his life-work to reconstruct in text and drawing the holy houses of the Hebrews by critical study of the original texts alone. He has, by mastery of the subject, been able to correct both the lexicons and all previous writings of those who worked in the same field. It is a contribution to the cause of order and of harmony in the region of the intellect and taste; and its animating spirit is a deep and twofold sympathy, on one side with the self-sufficing perfectness of Hellenism, on the other with the momentous and tentative efforts of the modern mind and the inner consciousness of the modern heart."—*Sat. Palmer, Edward Henry, 1840–1882, b. at Cambridge, Eng.; spent three years in London as a clerk, and, returning to Cambridge in 1859, began to study Oriental languages, and in 1863 was admitted as a sizar to St. John's College, where he graduated in 1867 and became a Fellow of the college. He was one of a party of explorers who made a survey of Sinai in 1868–69, and in 1870, together with C. F. Tyrwhitt Drake, he undertook for the Palestine Exploration Fund an exploration of the great Desert of the Wanderings. In 1871 he was appointed Lord Almoner's reader and professor of Arabic at Cambridge University. He resigned that post in 1871 to become a journalist on the staff of the London Standard and contributor to the Saturday Review and other papers. In 1882 he was sent by the Admiralty on a mission to Jaffa and the Desert of Suez to secure the neutrality of the sheiks of the tribes along the canal. Having been successful in this, he was appointed chief interpreter to the forces, and was proceeding to Nakhl to an interview with some Arab sheiks, when he was attacked by a party of hostile Bedouins and lost his life. His remains, with those of his two companions, Captain Gill, R.E., and Lieutenant Charrington, R.N., were taken to England and buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. The First Prayer-Book of Edward VI. compared with the Successive Revisions of the Book of Common Prayer, together with a Concordance and Index to the Rubrics in the Several Editions, Oxf. and Lon., 1877, p. 8vo. Anon.

"In these two volumes, which, with different titles, really form one consecutive and elaborate work, we have unquestionably the fullest and most accurate account yet published of the successive revisions of the Book of Common Prayer. . . . In the introductory volume the history of the various changes in the Prayer-Book is hunted up and illustrated from a great variety of sources. . . . The second volume gives a tabular view of all these variations."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 306.

The Archæology of Rome, Oxf. and Lon., 1874–77, 8vo. (Only the first volume of this work bears a number, and the full titles are sometimes given at the end, instead of at the beginning, of the volumes.) Vol. i.: I., The Primitive Fortifications; II., The Walls and Gates of Rome; III., The Historical Construction of Walls. Part II., Illustrations, (forming a separate volume.) 1874. Chapter or Part IV., The Egyptian Obelisks: to which is added a Supplement to the First Three Parts, which form the First Volume, 1876. Vol. ii., The Forum Romanum, the Via Sacra, 1876.

"We must end by again repeating our deep sense of Mr. Parker's real services to Roman archæology, combined with our regret that lack of order should have made his books so much harder to make use of them than they might have been, and that a lack of sound scholarship, we might almost say a contempt for sound scholarship, has led him into mistakes which are likely to make his real researches less valued than they deserve to be."—*Sat. "The whole book, with its minute investigation of every inch of the aqueducts, will be a useful guide to any one who wishes to study them on the spot. But no treatment could raise the subject of the present volume to the same level of interest as its predecessors."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 171.

"Students of Christian antiquity will find plenty of interesting matter in this volume of Mr. Parker's, which contains, he tells us in his preface, the substance of Cialdini's work on Mosaics. The subject is not one of which he has made such a special study as he has of Rome's other antiquities, and the present work is to a considerable extent made up of extracts from M. Vitet, from Crowe and Cavalcaselle, and we have, too, a good many remarks from Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt."—Spectator, lii. 1384.

"Captain Parker's story is delightfully told. . . . The sensation that one gets in reading his book is like that of going out in a yacht on a fine morning, with a spanking breeze. . . . The narrative, from the first appearance of the boy of fourteen on the deck of the 'North Carolina' to the parting at Abbeville after the collapse of the Confederacy, is steadily pursued, and the facts are told in a manly and straightforward way. . . . It is particularly in that part of the book which deals with the civil war that one is struck by the impartial candor of its criticism."—Nation, xxxvii. 355.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"If we except Washington Irving and Prescott, there is no United States writer who shows greater skill than Mr. Parkman in giving full value to his researches. . . . Even Motley, though a writer of remarkable talent, is not, on the whole, so great a master of his pen as Mr. Parkman. Indeed, the latter pleases both by what he says and by the impression which he leaves of saying less than he might say, and by avoiding alike undue emphasis and artificial exaggeration."—Ath., No. 2619.

"Col. Parnell has brought into clear relief parts of the contest before unnoticed; he has thrown fresh light on its better-known passages; and he has woven his copious store of facts into a work which, if not free from defects, has the great merits of research and freshness. His judgments, too, upon men and things are, for the most part, impartial and true; and he has, we think, completely exploded the undeserved estimate made of Peterborough and Rooke, while he has done justice to the military skill and heroism of the great Huguenot, Galway. On the other hand, he has failed to combine his narrative into a dramatic whole. It is too much a series of detached scenes; and we cannot agree with his judgment on Berwick,—a really great chief, whose remarkable exploits he endeavours throughout the book to depreciate."—W. "A very charming love-tale. . . . It is difficult to decide whether the palm of interest is to be awarded to the very amusing sketch of the shifty lady of fashion, with her misplaced pride cropping out on one occasion, and her utter want of self-respect when wealth is to be secured, on another; or to the no less excellent view afforded of the intolerance of some forms of Protestant dissent, and of the bad effects which religious formalism and social isolation produce on the formation of character."—Ath., No. 2255.

Parry, Charles Hubert Hastings, M.A., Mus. Doc., b. 1848, at Bournemouth, Eng.; son of T. Gambier Parry, infra; educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford; was for some years engaged in business in London, but since 1873 has devoted himself to musical composition, producing symphonies, sonatas, &c., and to the study of musical development. He contributed many articles to Grove's Dictionary of Music. Studies of Great Composers: with Portraits, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo. (Contains short biographies, with introductory remarks to each section.)

"The composers of whom the author treats are eleven in number,—Palestrina, Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Wagner. . . . Dr. Parry possesses the power of grasping clearly in his own mind and bringing plainly before his readers the salient points of a composer's style, and the difference between the method adopted by one and that which is natural to another. . . . He is extremely catholic in his sympathies; he writes with equal admiration of the grand simplicity of Handel and of the elaborate combinations of Wagner."—Ath., No. 3096.

"Every reader of Lord Macaulay's essays knows something of Dorothy Osborne; but we have to thank Mr. Parry, and still more the owner of Dorothy's love-letters, for enabling us to form an intimate acquaintance with the charming woman through the long years of Sir William Temple's courtship. . . . The editor of this fascinating volume has done his part with judgment, and with full appreciation of his heroine's excellences. "Whatever be the deficiencies in Mr. Parton's workmanship, his work has many and great merits. It is . . . exactly what it terms itself,—a genuine life of Voltaire, and not a critique upon the life and character of Voltaire. In this respect it differs entirely from the works of Strauss and of Morley. . . . The result of the conscientious tenacity with which Mr. Parton has clung to his subject is that he has written a book which, whatever its defects, makes the English and American public for the first time acquainted with Voltaire somewhat in the same sense in which they have long been acquainted with Johnson or Scott."—Nation, xxxiii. 276.

Pater, Walter Horatio, b. 1839, in London; educated at the King's School, Canterbury, and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1862; elected Fellow of Brasenose, in which college he has since held various offices. He has spent much time in Italy, France, and Germany, and has contributed to the leading English reviews. 1. The Renaissance: Studies in Art and Poetry, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1877; 4th thousand, rev. and enl., 1888.

"These remarkable 'Studies' are among the signs of the times. Since the days of the purists, when Mr. Ruskin denounced the Renaissance as hollow and unholy, a singular change has come over the younger generation who are now in turn moulding the literature and the art of the country. Poetry, painting, and criticism alike—the poetry and pictures of Mr. Rossetti, the poetry of Mr. Swinburne, not to mention a host of imitators, the paintings of Mr. Burne Jones, together with divers critical writings such as the work now before us—all tell of a modern renaissance of the old Renaissance, of a new life sometimes surrendered to passion and to pleasure, but in its better aspects aspiring through the ministration of the arts to conditions of high mental enjoyment and pure æsthetic culture. . . . Mr. Pater, following in the wake of certain French writers, has discovered a præ-Renaissance,—to use his own words, a Renaissance within the limits of the middle age itself, a brilliant, but in part abortive, effort to do for human life and the human mind, at the end of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, 'what was afterwards done in the fifteenth.' . . . The disquisition on Leonardo da Vinci will be read even by those who are versed in the whole library that has grown out of the most fertile of themes in the Italian revival. Subtle and searching insight is shown in that part of the artist's career which lies on the frontier of the natural and the supernatural, which touched on divination, 'clairvoyance,' the alchemist's secret, with the strange approaches in animal creation to phases in humanity. . . . The last paragraph in the book carries the inquiry to a consummation; it points to the be-all and the end-all of every phase of art, past, present, and to come. The moral taught seems to be that life is short, but that art can make it long; that the wisest men give themselves to art and song, and thus get as many pulsations as possible into the allotted time. Art comes 'professing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments' sake.'"—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 123.

2. Marius the Epicurean: his Sensations and Ideas, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"The mental history of a young man whose chief interest in life is the consideration and solution of questions about life and how to live it well. . . . A more 'subjective' book could scarcely be written; yet the pictures of ancient life and old aspects of Italy which it contains are numerous and beautiful enough to attract even readers who do not hanker after mysticism. . . . The air of the work, the atmosphere through which we see the pictures pass and succeed each other, is chill and clear, like some silver dawn of summer breaking on secular olive gardens, cold distant hills, and cities built of ancient marbles."—*Sat. "The distinctive merit and characteristic of the whole book will be missed if the reader does not appreciate what the author has evidently tried to do. He must not consider himself as listening to a tale-teller, but as watching an artist gradually adding stroke to stroke, and producing, not so much a successive effect, as in narration, but a combined and total impression, as in drawing."—Sat. Rev., lxiii. 920.

4. Appreciations: with an Essay on Style, Lon., 1889, cr. 8vo. (Contains reprinted essays on Coleridge, Wordsworth, &c.)

General Criticism:

"There is no living writer who excels Mr. Pater in grace of style. He does not indulge in passages of sustained eloquence, but every word he writes is calculated to be the best word in that place, to have its full signification brought out. Here and there, of course, there are passages of exceptional beauty; but, fine as these are, Mr. Pater's special faculty for verbal expression is more noticeable in his occasional use of certain words which in his mouth, so to speak, act like a charm. While he is the most rhythmical of English prose-writers, his is the music of the viola rather than of the violin."—Ath., No. 2992.

General Criticism:

"So admirable an artist has rarely been content to do so little with his art; so brilliant and pungent a thinker has perhaps never been content so long to dwell on the very border-land of insipidity. Born with a gift which we believe would have enabled him to adorn a wide circle of themes, he has almost obstinately confined himself to the embroidery of one. Dowered with a rare ear for metrical effects, educated in all the niceties of metrical science, he has of set purpose chosen the most sing-song of English metres as the almost exclusive vehicle of his ideas. The laureate of the tea-table, with his humdrum stories of girls that smell of bread and butter, is in his inmost heart the most arrogant and visionary of mystics. There is no figure more interesting or more difficult to analyze on the poetic stage of our generation."—Ath., No. 3059.

"Last night I read the new Poem, (First part of 'Victories of Love,') I can truly say, with a great deal of pleasure; —and as you know my aversion to that form of composition when not inexorably necessary, and with what horror I avoid the things commonly called 'Poems,' you may fairly take to yourself a very considerable credit out of that fact alone! The question whether it had not been better that a man of your powers had trained himself to prose, as exquisitely as you have to verse, and stood by the vigorous fact as the gods have unalterably made it, instead of floating in this light, beautiful way, rods and miles above it; the question whether, even in verse itself, with this admirable power of execution, you should not now take some more robust class of subjects, and close the Troubadour Enterprise as well finished, these and other questions are still open with me. . . . There is a great deal of talent in this book; the execution of it nearly perfect; and the sentiments and doctrines set forth in it generally exalted and noble:—what a pity they went soaring miles above the rugged, contradictory facts, instead of standing amid them, toilsomely constraining them into melody."—*Letter of T. "The social life and politics which are portrayed in his pages have a surprising air of reality; and though we occasionally find ourselves differing from his conclusions, we are bound to admit that, wherever we have tested them, we have found his narratives and descriptions not only accurate, but pervaded by an impartial and discriminating spirit. . . . One of the most acute and interesting books which have appeared for a long time."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 645.

"Not a description of the checkered country in its entirety, . . . but a special study on its central nationality. . . . Everything peculiarly Magyar is dwelt upon at full length and—let us add—with profound knowledge, the fruit of repeated and protracted sojourns in the country, of a perfect familiarity with the Magyar language, and of conscientious research and enquiry. In spite of the comparative narrowness of the subject, and in spite of the mass of foreign terms and phrases—especially Magyar—with which his descriptions are overloaded, Mr. Patterson's book will be found highly interesting from beginning to end."—Nation, xiii. 181.

Pattison, Rev. Mark, M.A., B.D., 1813–1884, b. at Hornby, Yorkshire; graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1837; Fellow of Lincoln College 1840–61, tutor 1843–54; ordained 1840; rector of Lincoln College from 1861 till his death. He was intimate with the leaders of the Tractarian movement, and took part in their translation of the Fathers, but subsequently adopted liberal views in regard to theological questions, and was one of the writers of "Essays and Reviews." His life was chiefly devoted to study, but at one period he took an active interest in university reform, and spent some time in investigating the condition and methods of the German universities. While at Berlin in 1858 he acted as correspondent of the Times, and during his later life he was a frequent contributor to the Quarterly Review, the Nineteenth Century, and other periodicals. 1. "It is needless to say that Mr. Pattison's work is based throughout on the best materials, that a variety of documents hitherto unprinted have been consulted, and that the story gains much in vividness as well as in fidelity through the conscientious use of the original data. We conceive that, as a picture of literary life in the sixteenth century, the present biography is without a rival."—Ath., No. 2468.

Rev.*, lix. 349.

"This memoir contains, we are persuaded, a most unfair picture of Mark Pattison, though one drawn by his own hand. "We have seldom met in fiction with a more fascinating little witch than Renée Dalbarade. . . . The author . . . can paint pictures, and she can draw characters. She has fine artistic perceptions of form and colour, and she does not overload her descriptions. . . . She wants merely a little to make her work absolutely good; for she has some rare and charming qualities which ought to place her among our favourite writers."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 612.

5. Thorpe Regis. By the Author of "The Rose-Garden." Lon., 1874, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The predominant charm of her narrative is the sentiment which pervades it, and which wraps the whole in a tender, poetical light, even when the situation is most dreary and the characters brought on the scene are least attractive. . . . And yet there is no want at all of realistic humour and truth."—Spectator, xlvii. 210.

(Ed.) Prisons and Reformatories at Home and Abroad, Lon., 1872, 8vo. 2. The Fall of Constantinople: being the Story of the Fourth Crusade, Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"The main thesis of Mr. Pears' book is that the irruption of the Ottoman Turks into Eastern Europe was entirely due to the crushing blow inflicted on the Byzantine empire by the fourth crusade, all other causes which led up to that irruption being of very secondary importance. . . . Differing from Mr. Pears on his main thesis, we are yet bound to do him justice by pointing out the many merits of his work. It has not been put together at second-hand, but shows a wide knowledge of the original authorities of the period, both eastern and western. Its style is agreeable, and even vigorous. Moreover, a residence of some years in Constantinople has enabled the author to describe scenes and localities with a freedom and picturesque thoroughness which only the eye-witness can possess."—C. "It is a manifesto by an able, straightforward, and cultivated man on behalf of a 'Freethought' which, as developed in these essays, includes atheism, socialism, and free love. . . . The object of the book is distinctly declared to be not destructive, but regenerative and synthetical,—'to deduce a rational enthusiasm and a possible basis of morals.' . . . In spite of strange tenets and vast assumptions, Mr. Pearson is neither crack-brained nor a charlatan; he is an earnest, bold, and public-spirited writer. . . . The enthusiastic or constructive side of Mr. Pearson's creed seems to us singularly weak, even altogether abortive."—Ath., No. 3156.

"Equipped with letters of introduction to many leading Unionists on the one side, and Home-rulers on the other, and armed with a circular letter from Mr. Timothy Harrington, the Secretary of the National League, . . . Mr. Pellew journeyed throughout Ireland, making inquiries wherever he went, and talking with representative men of every class. These conversations he reported at length, and the most important of them form the present volume. The fact that Mr. Pellew gives us the opinions of the speakers just as they were given to him, and without comment, immensely enhances the value of his book." —Spectator, lxi. 1818.

"The 'Life of St. Hugh,' which is its ostensible subject, takes up less than half the volume, more than one hundred and seventy pages of which are devoted to the history of the establishment of the see of Lincoln, and to biographies of its first occupants, together with sketches of the monarchs and clergy of St. Hugh's time. . . . Canon Perry has successfully brought out the leading traits of Hugh's very remarkable character in his well-written narrative. Perhaps it is as well that he has not attempted any general summary of his life. Mr. Dimock's portrait of this holy and courageous bishop is too powerfully drawn to be easily surpassed."—*Sat. Edited by his Sister, Clara Gottschalk. Phila., 1881, cr. 8vo.

"A book which is not only of interest on account of its simple but vivid descriptions of events in various countries, and its revelations of the tastes and characteristics of an original musician, but which will some day be of inestimable value as showing more clearly perhaps than any other record the attitude of various rude and semi-civilized communities toward music and virtuosity."—Nation, xxxiv. 16.

"There seems to us to be, here and there, too much æsthetic consciousness and effort in these poems, here and there a little poor and conventional trilling, and now and then a false note, due to the intellectual will-work with which Mrs. Pfeiffer allows herself to interrupt her poetic mood. . . . But there is a great weight of truly-blended thought and feeling in many of the poems; and in not a few of the sonnets, where the thought and feeling are so closely intertwined that it is impossible to separate one from the other, there are flights of true imagination of which, to our mind, almost the greatest of English sonnet-writers might, and possibly would, have been proud."—Spectator, xlix. 112.

"The instinct of the masses is at one with the foremost of statesmen in believing that the depopulation of our villages, the overcrowding of our towns, the poverty and dependence of our labourers, may be ameliorated by legislation which shall bring together the waste now craving the spade and the spade ever longing for the waste. To amass relevant facts and to recount tested experiences in this direction, is the object of Mr. Phillips's comprehensive book. It traces the development of land-tenure amongst the Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, Romans, in the Middle Ages, in modern Europe, and in America. It narrates with special minuteness the agrarian history of England; the change from allodial to feudal holdings; the story of the manor and the villein, of the free labourer and the hired artisan; the beginnings of primogeniture and entail, of rent, taxation, pauperism, public debt; dissecting finally, in a frankly judicial spirit, the remedial proposals of Giffen and Mallock on the one hand, of George and Wallace on the other."—Spectator, lix. 1122.

"A series of interesting sketches, not a regular history. . . . The original part of Mr. Picciotto's sketches begins . . . with the return of the Israelites in the seventeenth century."—Acad., ix. 304.

"Our author found the field all but untrodden. Even the archives of the older synagogues, treasures of useful and valuable lore, remained scarcely explored or even known. To these Mr. Picciotto has had the privilege of free access. . . For a large class of readers the most attractive part of the book will probably be that in which he traces the origin and rise of the Jewish families which have made themselves a name, not in England only, but throughout Europe, for financial and commercial ability."—*Sat. "Mr. Picton's work may be summarily described as a modern Radical's view of Cromwell. . . . Mr. Picton's style is pleasant and easy, as long as he allows himself to be natural and does not fall into 'gush,' into Carlylese, or into modern political cant. . . . The book even at its worst is always readable, and at its best has considerable interest and value both as a study of Cromwell's character and as a useful collection of what is known about him, including some information to which Carlyle had not access."—*Sat. "If no one can gossip more pleasantly, certainly few have a better right to gossip. . . . Mr. Planché comes before the public in four distinct characters. First, he is an accomplished man of the world, seventy-six years of age, who from youth has been familiar with the stage and mixed with the best literary and theatrical society. Secondly, he has been one of the most prolific dramatists of his day, having originated a species of drama with respect to which he has remained altogether without a rival. Thirdly, he is a distinguished archæologist. . . . Fourthly, he has held for nearly twenty years the rank of Rouge Croix Poursuivant in the Heralds' College, and has consequently paid official visits to foreign courts when some potentate has been invested with the Order of the Garter. . . . So many and so good are the anecdotes he relates that two or three could not be taken from the rest by any process more critical than the toss of a halfpenny."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 192.

The Divina Commedia and Canzoniere of Dante Alighieri: with Biographical Introduction, Notes, and Essays, &c.: vol. i., Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"This handsome volume is the first instalment of the great work on which Dean Plumptre is understood to have been for many years engaged, and which will comprise, when completed, a translation of the whole of the 'Commedia,' and also the 'Canzoniere,' with illustrative notes throughout; besides a life of the poet, and a series of essays or monographs on subjects of the highest interest and importance connected with his works. The present volume contains the life and the translation of the 'Inferno' and 'Purgatorio.' . . . The life is of very great value; indeed, one of the best that has yet been published in our own or any other language. It is written in a very vivid and attractive style. . . . It displays the most minute acquaintance not only with all the various works of Dante, but with numerous historians and critics who throw light on the subject. . . We turn with more mingled satisfaction to the translation. Perhaps a rooted conviction of the impossibility of the task (viz., the approximate reproduction of the terza rima) may bias one's judgment. . . . We find on almost every page epithets or ideas introduced which, even if appropriate in themselves, are not represented by anything in the original. . . . The notes . . . are very helpful, contain much curious information, and . . . are often very full, and yet condensed."—E. Moore: Acad., xxx. 419.

Vol. ii., 1887. (This volume includes a series of "Studies" on "The Genesis and Growth of the Commedia," "Estimates, Contemporary and Later, of Dante," "Dante as an Observer and Traveller," and "Portraits of Dante.")

"The whole work is a monument of many years' devoted study, it is illustrated throughout by an unusual range of reading and culture in other fields of literature, and it is accompanied by a most copious and valuable index of subjects and names."—E. Moore: Acad., xxxiii. 19.

12. Wells Cathedral and its Deans, Lon., 1888, 8vo. 13. The Life and Letters of Thomas Ken, D.D., Bishop of Bath and Wells. Illust. Lon., 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

"This, in all likelihood, is the final biography of Ken. . . . Many searchers have volunteered their services in Dean Plumptre's undertaking; . . . much special information has been contributed by recognized experts in some of the subjects treated. . . . But it is not the amount of absolutely new material which constitutes the main value of this life and raises it far above its predecessors. Rather it is the skill and tender patience wherewith material already known, but neglected, has been manipulated."—Acad., xxxiv. 281.

"The enormous expansion to which the writer has subjected the materials at his command—an expansion applied impartially to what was important and what was unimportant—has necessarily left the picture somewhat thin and colourless."—Ath., No. 3186.

"The volume on the 'Philosophy of Music' turns out to be a popular account of Helmholtz's work on the physical and physiological foundations of music. . . . In passing over an investigation of the psychological side of music Dr. Pole may, no doubt, say that he is following Helmholtz's example. But . . . Helmholtz does not offer his treatise as a philosophy of music, whereas Dr. Pole does. . . . What he has aimed at doing he has actually done, and done well. Helmholtz's great work is a little formidable-looking to the ordinary reader, and in the volume now before us we have . . . a very full, clear, and readable account of that writer's discoveries in physical science."—*Sat. "All that has been gleaned, and gathered, and conjectured even, regarding the life and opinions of the great Hebrew thinker has been diligently studied by Mr. Pollock, and every statement Mr. Pollock makes regarding the facts may be accepted as true. He has given us in the introduction a critical account of all the important contributions to our knowledge of Spinoza which have appeared in various languages. He has sifted the numerous works which in recent years have discussed the various problems regarding the sources of Spinoza's philosophy. He has pondered over the aim, purpose, and method of Spinoza until these have almost become part of his own mental structure, and he sets forth the system of his master, not with the calm circumspection of one who expounds a philosophy, but with the zeal, the earnestness, and with something of the intolerant fierceness of one who propagates a religion."—Spectator, liv. 187.

"These lectures, with one or two exceptions, were originally composed for the benefit of art students in the Slade School or at South Kensington. The aim of their author has therefore been not so much criticism as instruction. . . . It is only when he has to speak of the great achievements of the past that Mr. Poynter fairly casts aside the austere manners of the teacher; and it is here, therefore, that his capabilities as a critic are displayed to the best advantage."—*Sat. "There are certain female characters in novels which remind one of nothing so much as of a head by Greuze,—fresh, simple, yet of the cunningly simple type, 'innocent-arch,' and intensely natural. . . . 'My Little Lady' is a character of this Greuze-like kind. . . . The whole book is charming; quietly told, quietly thought, without glare or flutter, and interesting in both character and story, . . . and, if slight of kind, thoroughly good of its kind."—*Sat. Prestwich, Joseph, F.R.S., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1812, at Old Pensbury, Clapham, near London; was educated at University College, and engaged in business in London. He began in 1835 to contribute important papers to the journal of the Geological Society; was president of the Geological Society 1870–72, vice-president of the Royal Society 1870–71, and appointed professor of geology at Oxford in 1874. He is a corresponding member of the French Institute, and has received medals from the Geological and other societies for papers embodying the results of his researches. Geology, Chemical, Physical, and Stratigraphical: vol. i., Chemical and Physical; vol. ii., Stratigraphical and Physical. Maps and Illust. Oxf., 1886–88, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

"As the Nestor of the geological army of Britain, Prof. Prestwich is naturally conservative. But his conservatism is of so liberal a type that probably not even the rawest and, naturally, also most advanced recruit would be found to object to it. His purpose in this work is, indeed, to interpret the generally accepted facts of geology according to the views of the non-uniformitarian school, and that he does so with marked skill goes without saying; but his opposition is only to the most extreme forms of the Uniformitarian creed, and he repudiates all the more startling vagaries of the old Catastrophists. . . . As to the volumes themselves, they are without doubt the handsomest which geology has yet seen devoted to its teaching. . . . The illustrations are unique."—Ath., No. 3184.

"Theory and fact are seldom so happily united as in this volume. . . . Mr. Price does not fall into the error which has been called—by Jevons, if we remember rightly—the fallacy of a single principle. He is aware that there cannot be 'any single panacea for social ills.' He expects to see 'the old relation of wage-payer and wage-receiver continuing side by side with the new developments' of co-operation and industrial partnership. He does not attempt to confine within strict classifications the endless variety of affairs and institutions. At the same time, by a judicious arrangement, he enables us to grasp the immense mass of heterogeneous details which he embraces."—F. Y. EDGEWORTH: Acad., xxxii. 402.

Proctor, Richard Anthony, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1837–1888, b. in London; educated at King's College, London, and at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1860 as twenty-third wrangler; elected a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1866. In 1869 he advanced, on theoretical grounds, a theory of the solar corona which has since been generally accepted, and also that of the inner complex solar atmosphere, which was afterwards advanced by Prof. Charles A. Young. Much of his time was given to the popularization of scientific results. He founded Knowledge as a weekly journal in 1881, but changed it in 1885 to a monthly. He contributed largely to other periodicals, and was very successful as a lecturer. He made a lecturing tour in the United States in 1873–74, and another in Australia and New Zealand in 1879, and in 1884 returned to the United States, and after lecturing in various cities settled in St. Joseph, Mo. "In the present work we have a very fair statement of the various problems with respect to the sun which have either been solved or at present await solution. . . . Mr. Proctor's chief defect is that he is a little too apt now and then to write as a special pleader for one of several conflicting theories, for none of which there can be said perhaps to be quite decisive evidence. Still, perhaps the general public will hardly look upon this as a fault; and at all events, if a fault, it adds considerable vivacity to the book."—Ath., No. 2268.

"Lord Salisbury's political career has been a striking one, and affords scope for interesting and picturesque treatment. But the treatment which it receives in these volumes is that of a flippant and ignorant pamphleteer. Scraps of his speeches are selected, not so much with a view to illustrate his character or elucidate an interesting period of political history as for the purpose of gratifying the writer's political animosities."—Spectator, lviii. 1137.

"Professor Pulszky's book is a treatise most comprehensive in its aims, containing the results of a very full study on the subject, and showing throughout a well-sustained vigour of independent thought. . . . I cannot think that he has solved the vast and difficult problem that he has attacked. . . . "It is not often that our literature is enriched by a work on so virgin a soil as Mr. Ralston has begun to till in the book before us. . . . It is thoroughly well executed throughout, and bears no trace of the painful toil which its author must have undergone before he could himself fully understand, and then convey so pleasantly to his readers, the idiomatic sense of the many songs and spells in obscure dialects of a difficult language, which are to be read in easy English in his pages. . . . Ram, James. The Philosophy of War, Lon., 1878, 12mo; new ed., 1880, cr. 8vo.

"His main position is that war is 'one of the good things of the world,' and, politically and morally, not only justifiable but beneficent. Nature, he argues, has obviously chosen, chiefly and by preference, forcible methods—pitiless methods, if you will—for the improvement of the denizens of the earth. Her law is that the weak must go to the wall, and it is best that it should be so. Any interference with her plans only leads to a diminution of the general welfare. . . . Mr. Ram sees clearly what his premises involve, and accepts the conclusion that 'the whole world is turned upon the pivot of adversity.' . . . The whole superstructure rests on the assumption that this world is under the dominion, not of a loving and righteous Creator and Father, but of a certain power called Nature. . . . We need hardly say that we hold this to be a great and dangerous falsehood. Bearing, however, this protest and the inferences from it in mind, the most timid reader will get nothing but good from the bracing and vigorous atmosphere of Mr. Ram's pages."—Spectator, li. 959.

Anon. 2. Henry Holbeach, Student in Life and Philosophy: a Narrative and a Discussion, Lon., 1865, 2 vols. cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1866.

"The 'narrative,' . . . which figures so largely in the title and so meagrely in the book itself, is an illustration of the old saying that almost anybody who will simply and faithfully record what he has heard and seen in life is in a position to add to the public stock of amusement or of information. To the outer world this 'study of an obscure Puritan colony' is entertaining and instructive, even after the more vivid pictures of dissenting life painted by the author of 'Salem Chapel.' . . . The remainder . . . is as dull and wearisome a salmagundi of all the odds and ends that a tolerably clever and intensely self-complacent gentleman could put upon paper as it has been our weary duty to toil through for months past."—*Sat. "It was not Gibbon's purpose to examine in detail the reigns of the Sassanids as sovereigns of Persia, or to describe the condition of that country under each of those monarchs. Mr. Rawlinson has undertaken this work, and he has done it with conscientious care. His style may lack animation, and the reader may here and there find it difficult to shake off a sense of weariness; but Mr. Rawlinson may be supposed to have accustomed himself to the stately pace of Eastern caravans, and experience has taught us that we are not to expect from him either more rapid or more lively movement. Still, there is nothing to regret in the appearance of this volume. It is distinctly an addition to the sum of our historical knowledge, which historical students will find it worth their while to read."—Sat. Rev., xli. 813.

Reade, Amos. Life in the Cut, Lon., 1888, p. 8vo. (On canal and barge life.)

Reade, Charles, D.C.L., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] d. 1884. He produced a dramatic version of Zola's "L'Assommoir," entitled "Drink," which held the stage for some time, and a play called "Love and Money," (1883,) on which he founded a story called "A Perilous Secret." For biog., see READE, CHARLES L., infra. 1. Put Yourself in his Place, Lon., 1870, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"We do not forget 'George Eliot' when we say, as we do say, that the author of 'Put Yourself in his Place' is now the greatest living writer of English fiction; and that makes it all the more melancholy that he will do what he has here done."—Nation, x. 423.

2. A Terrible Temptation: a Story of the Day, Lon., 1871, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Told with all Mr. Reade's power, and, we may add, with nearly all his usual eccentricity of style. We do not think, on the whole, that we should like to see him alter this, for without it he would not be the Charles Reade that we know; but we hope no one else will imitate it, for what is tolerable chiefly by reason of its originality would be an intolerable affectation if not original."—Ath., No. 2284.

General Criticism:

"Mr. Reade's real power, which we acknowledge to be considerable, appears to us to consist in three things. He can depict the outsides of his characters admirably. He cannot or does not make them thoroughly intelligible, but he can and does make them real. . . . Then Mr. Reade can both invent and describe incident, stirring incident, with a force which has been given to few novelists. . . . And, finally, Mr. Reade has a command of pathos which he very rarely indeed exerts, but which is of a very genuine and rare kind. . . . These are great qualities in a novelist; yet Mr. Reade himself will probably regard the reviewer who acknowledges them as a slightly malignant idiot, because he sees in the writing more of metallic iridescence than of true, self-derived flash. Well, each one has the defect of his qualities, and a modest man could not have written Charles Reade's novels at all."—Spectator, lv. 928.

Reade, Charles L. and Compton. Charles Reade, Dramatist, Novelist, and Journalist: a Memoir, compiled chiefly from his Literary Remains, Lon., 1887, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"It is a clumsy compilation, made up of hitherto unprinted essays and scraps of letters and diaries,—which, the reader is told, Mr. C. L. Reade has 'selected with care from a voluminous mass of literary and personal remains, individually,'—and of 'narrative' by Mr. Compton Reade. Neither portion of the work has been well done."—Ath., No. 3103.

"His speculations represent years of patient thought, while they possess the rare advantage of being put forth by one who commands a practical knowledge of mechanics acquired during a long professional career as an engineer and architect. . . . According to Mr. Reade, the favourite hypothesis of contraction by loss of heat is utterly incompetent to account for the phenomena of mountain-building; indeed, he believes that the cooling of our earth has not extended to such a depth that we need consider the internal contraction as a geological cause! His own view—the view which it is the prime object of this treatise to expound—regards mountain-ranges as due to sedimentation, accompanied by local changes of temperature in the earth's crust."—F. "This book is a very admirable piece of work. . . . It is deeply interesting to all who have lived through the political period to which it refers, and, so far as we can judge, will be deeply interesting even to future generations of politicians. . . . For the rest, Mr. Wemyss Reid's sketch of the man is admirably effective."—Spectator, lxi. 967.

"Throughout his narrative, dealing often at great length and in much detail with complicated political transactions, he has kept well in mind the fundamental consideration that he is a biographer, not an historian. . . . Men who have followed closely the political career of Mr. Forster, and whom necessity or choice has acquainted with the controversies in which he was engaged, will find that they have still something to learn from Mr. Wemyss Reid's volumes. . . . But the main charm of the present book lies in the glimpses it affords of the growth and formation of a remarkable and unique character."—Sat. Rev., lxvi. 46.

In this feat he seems to have succeeded a second time. . . . It has one great characteristic which should not be overlooked. It is all the result of original research and observation."—*Sat. "The analysis of ancient Egyptian belief completely upsets the theory of De Brosses, which Professor Max Müller had in the first series of the Hibbert Lectures shown to be untenable,—namely, that all religion had its beginning in Fetishism; while the examination of Egyptian myths adds vastly to the strength of the conclusions reached by comparative mythologists who have worked in the wide field of Aryan tradition. To these two points Mr. Renouf addresses himself specially throughout these lectures; and if we admit the truthfulness of the picture, we must allow that his work has made substantial additions to our knowledge on a subject the importance of which cannot be exaggerated."—*Sat. 2. Celtic Britain, ("Early Britain,") Lon., 1882, 12mo. 3. Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by Celtic Heathendom, (Hibbert Lectures,) Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"Few even of those who have given some study to the subject will be prepared to meet with such an abundance of well-established (or, at least, highly probable) results as are brought together in the earlier chapters. It is doubtless true, as the author would be the first to acknowledge, that the book contains, besides the conclusions which may be regarded as fairly secure, a large number of suggestions which future investigation may very likely show to be untenable. . . . The Hibbert Lectures on Celtic mythology will be none the less an epoch-making book."—HENRY BRADLEY: Acad., xxxiii. 369.

"The whole book is readable, from the vivid sketch of the pantheon of the Allobroges that takes up its earlier pages, down to the summing up of the proto-Celtic creed in its final lines. . . . Full and minute as it is, and complete in itself, this volume is but the first part of a great Celtic mythology of which two more parts (on the 'Dark Underwold Divinities' and on the 'Arthurian Legend') are to appear, it is to be hoped shortly."—F. "His study of the Brehon laws endowed him with an acuteness of perception that enabled him to thread his way with unerring instinct through the mazes of Irish history. More than this, it taught him to appreciate the feelings of the Irish natives, and at the same time to do justice to those efforts of the English Government which, however mistaken in design, however fruitless in results, were for the most part born of a good intention and an honest desire to civilize Ireland. . . . His work is not so much a history in the ordinary sense, as an organon or a clue wherewith to read history. And this is just what is wanted at the present time, when so many earnest students are being attracted to Irish history."—R. DUNLOP: Acad., xxxiii. 22.

Ritchie, Mrs. Anne Isabella, [ante, vol. iii., Thackeray, Miss Anne Elizabeth, add.,] b. 1838, in London; daughter of William Makepeace Thackeray; spent some years of her childhood in France, but has passed the greater part of her life in Kensington, London. Her first story, Little Scholars in the London Schools, appeared in the Cornhill Magazine under her father's editorship in 1860. In 1877 she was married to her cousin, Mr. Richmond Thackeray Ritchie. 1. Old Kensington, Lon., 1873, 8vo; 4th ed. same year.

General Criticism:

"The peculiar pleasure which all cultivated readers derive from Miss Thackeray's novels is by no means easy to analyze or describe. It is not poignant and intense, but exquisite and satisfying,—more satisfying, indeed, than much of the pleasure which has the qualities of poignancy and intensity. . . . The interest of work like this is artistic rather than simply human. . . . By very delicate instinct she is able to discern, and by very subtle art to realize and make apparent, the interest which lies in the neglected corners of common life. It is comparatively easy to picture a great rapture or a great agony, though the picture can be executed adequately only by the power of genius; but to catch and fix those moments of complex emotion in which joy and sorrow, hope and fear, content and weariness, strike through the heart in such quick alternation as to seem simultaneous, is a task so difficult as to be impossible save to some highly-gifted artist. And yet these moments are much more frequent than the great crises of overmastering feeling; life is made up of them; and much of the charm of Miss Thackeray's work lies in her power of realizing those half-tones which most novelists compel us to take for granted."—Spectator, lix. 84.

"No work more clear and true and pure, more full of tenderness and grace, and of that insight which nothing but a keen sympathy with every phase of joy and sorrow can give, is produced among us than that by which she sustains the honours of her father's name."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 623.

Roberts, Rev. William Walter, matriculated at Merton College, Oxford, 1849; a Roman Catholic clergyman. The Pontifical Decrees against the Doctrine of the Earth's Movement, Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"The author of this book is a clergyman educated at Oxford who followed Cardinal Manning (of whom he is a near connection by marriage) into the Church of Rome, and was for many years a highly esteemed and beloved member of a congregation of secular priests, called Oblates of St. Charles, whom the cardinal established in London. In 1870 he joined in the movement set on foot amongst the more learned and conscientious of the Catholic clergy to avert the threatened decree of Papal infallibility, and published an essay with the object of showing that Papal authority had plainly committed itself to the condemnation of Galileo, and so unanswerably demonstrated its own fallibility. The present work is a much enlarged republication of that essay. . . . The full and true significance of Galileo's trial is now for the first time put plainly before the world."—Ath., No. 3016.

"A lucid and workmanlike hand-book, which will be the natural guide of apprentices in philosophy or the theory of politics who seek acquaintance with Hobbes, and which riper students will find by no means superfluous."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 307.

"A monograph which is a model in its kind. . . . He has evidently spared no pains in the investigation of dates and in the examination of the different forms in which Hobbes gave his views to the world; yet the accurate attention to details at which he has worked so thoroughly does not so obtrude itself as to confuse the main issues. . . . The exposition of Hobbes's system as a whole and of the relation of its various parts is masterly."—Ath., No. 3068.

"It has little or none of the solid information of the exploration reports, and it is altogether free from the overworked sentiment and doggerel which are so disagreeably frequent in Butler's books. But, on the whole, it seems to us to give a crisper and truer picture of the life in that cold, weird region than any of them."—Nation, xxix. 46.

"On looking into one of Major Butler's works on these countries, . . . we find, to our surprise, that Mr. Robinson has interpolated thence whole passages. . . . He has subjected to the same process the travels of Lord Southesk, and those of Lord Milton and Dr. Cheadle. . . . In condemning the mode in which this book has been composed we do not condemn the book itself. On the contrary, we believe its sketches of life and of nature to be, on the whole, by no means unfaithful."—Ath., No. 2704.

Robinson, Philip Stewart, (known as "Phil Robinson,") b. 1849, at Chunar, India, and educated at Marlborough College; became assistant editor of the Pioneer, of which his father, Rev. Julian Robinson, was editor, in 1869; was appointed editor of the Revenue Archives of the Benares Province in 1872; professor of literature 1873; of logic and metaphysics 1875; retired from the Indian service in 1877, and acted as correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in the Afghan and Egyptian wars. In 1881–82 he travelled through the United States as special commissioner of the New York World. 1. In my Indian Garden: with Preface by Edwin Arnold, Lon., 1878, 12mo; 3d ed. same year.

"These delightful papers will be new to English readers. . . . They are essays in natural history, but not so much essays on natural history as on the common objects of India. . . . They treat unhackneyed subjects with quaint humour and with remarkable literary skill and taste."—Acad., xiii. 319.

2. Under the Punkah, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

that we cannot but resent this piece of book making. . . . The object, according to Mr. Robinson himself, can be of little use to any one, and the execution is as careless as it possibly could be."—Ath., No. 2905.

5. Sinners and Saints: a Tour across the States and round them, Lon., 1883, cr. 8vo.

"Having journeyed through the United States, he desires to say something new about them. . . . Sixteen out of the twenty-nine chapters in his work deal with the Mormons. . . . He can write smoothly, and he has much experience of the world. Had he really given more thought to the Mormon problem, he might have produced readable sketches of life in Utah, but, as it is, his 'saints' are quite as unattractive as his 'sinners.'"—Ath., No. 2910.

"This is not altogether a Mormon book. The author carried his observant eyes on to California, and . . . down to Arizona and New Mexico. . . . The book as a whole is delightful. It has much real humor and some wit."—Nation, xxxvi. 556.

Robinson, Robert. Thomas Bewick: his Life and Times. Illust. Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1887. Published by the Author. (Contains letters previously unpublished, and new impressions from the original blocks of some of Bewick's engravings.)

"The local cult of Bewick . . . is of long standing, and was never more flourishing than now. We owe to it not only his townsman's impulse to build this latest monument to the artist and to the man, but that access to collections which gives a peculiar value to Mr. Robinson's labour of love. . . . He is the first admirer of their father who has had the intimate acquaintance of the daughters of Bewick for a quarter-century, as a qualification for the task which he has now accomplished so creditably."—Nation, xlv. 317.

A History of Agriculture and Prices in England from the Year of the Oxford Parliament (1259) to the Commencement of the Continental War (1793): compiled entirely from Original and Contemporaneous Records: vols. iii., iv., Oxf., 1882, 8vo.

"The amount of hard work among manuscripts to which the volumes before us testify is simply enormous. . . . As Mr. Rogers has taken a wide view of his duties, there is hardly an object of domestic life that is not mentioned in his pages. Apart from their value as a great contribution towards a history of England, they will be a perfect treasure to the editors of old documents and the student of manners."—Ath., No. 2847.

"After collecting and tabulating the most elaborate statistics of prices, both of food and of commodities of every kind, in early ages, Mr. Rogers gives it as his deliberate opinion that the theory of 'the good old times' was not far from the truth. Not that this is the way he himself expresses it, but this is very distinctly the result of his researches. For he tells us that the period which, of all others, most people probably regard as the most uncomfortable in all English history was really marked by 'substantial, unbroken prosperity.' In spite of civil broils, 'the fifteenth century and the early years of the sixteenth were the golden age of the English husbandman, the artisan, and the labourer.' . . . 'The condition of the English people,' he says, expressly, 'was that of an almost monotonous prosperity.' . . . Mr. Rogers is rather given to the practice of enunciating opinions on matters apart from his own subject which have no other foundation than his own surmises. . . . But the solid facts contained in the work are, of course, its main justification, and these make it quite an indispensable book to all who wish to study closely our social and economic history."—JAMES GAIRDNER: Acad., xxi. 277.

Vols. v., vi., 1888.

"The present volumes have all the merits and defects of their predecessors. They show all the former mastery over detail and the same familiar knowledge of the political and social history of the times of which they treat; blended with this, and as we feel in most inharmonious contrast, we have now and then expressions of party feeling which jar on the reader."—Ath., No. 3159.

"Mr. Rogers is one of the very few people who partially, it may be, and from a single point of view, do know the English middle ages. . . . Mr. Rogers's present volumes consist in part of a working up into continuous narrative and argumentative form of the data given in his 'History of Prices,' in part of a similar working up of similar data collected from other writers for the period since Elizabeth's reign to the present day. . . . His picture in the first three or four hundred pages of the condition of the lower and middle classes in England during the middle ages—a picture whose details may be familiar to scholars, but which must certainly be novel to the general reader—has great interest and merit."—*Sat. "The narrative throws light on not a few of the great junctures, . . . and is enriched by a mass of official documents, many of which are published for the first time. The arrangement is clear and the style easy. . . . The book is not so much a history of General Beauregard's career as it is a fulsome panegyric of him."—Nation, xxxviii. 214.

Romanes, George John, LL.D., F.R.S., b. 1848, at Kingston, Canada; graduated with honors in natural science at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1870; was Burney prize essayist in 1873, and Croonian lecturer to the Royal Society in 1875 and in 1881. "This volume is the first instalment of a series in which Mr. Romanes proposes to deal with the whole subject of mental evolution in man. . . . Language . . . has been put forward of recent years as the ineffaceable distinction between man and brute, the impassable interruption to a continuity of mental development from one to the other. Mr. Romanes is an evolutionist along the whole line; and he joins issue on the one remaining point where the theory is still disputed by the only opponents worth considering."—Alfred W. GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Poetry more picturesque it would be hard to find. It is not only that, after it is expressed, she can set off and illustrate her thought or feeling by pictures, but that picture is her customary and natural means of expression. The abstract she has nothing to do with; in her mind, as her mind is here revealed, every idea puts on shape and color. Incident to this power of hers is that characteristic of her writing which, on a first perusal, is the most striking, and which has been so attractive to the wearied reader of ninety in a hundred of recent poets,—namely, the simplicity, frequently homely or quaint, the pictorial vividness, the life, of her language."—Nation, iii. 47.

"Miss Rossetti ranks foremost among living poetesses. She and she alone could write such magic lyrics as 'Dream-Land.' Her sonnets bear but a small proportion to her purely lyrical poems. Some were written at a very early age; they are all or mostly very sombre, but are as impressive as they are beautiful. . . . There is a very marked affinity between much of Miss Rossetti's work and that of her brother Gabriel."—WILLIAM SHARP: Sonnets of this Century, Notes, 317.

Rossetti, Gabriel Charles Dante, known as Dante Gabriel Rossetti, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1828–1882; b. in London, and educated at King's College School; became a student at the Royal Academy, and in 1849 exhibited his first picture, "The Girlhood of Mary Virgin." About that time the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, of which he was the leading spirit, was formed, and in 1850 they established a magazine, The Germ, in which some of Rossetti's poems appeared, two of which, "The Blessed Damozel" and "My Sister's Sleep," were written before he was nineteen years old. Besides his contributions to the Germ, a periodical which had only a brief existence, Rossetti published a few poems in the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine in 1856. For many years he published very little; and, while he exercised a marked influence upon the English literature and art of his day, his poems were known only to a few, and his paintings, which he refused during his lifetime to exhibit in any public gallery, were all in private collections. He died, after a long period of ill health, at Westgate-on-Sea, near Margate, Kent, and was buried in the neighboring church-yard of Birchington. Two exhibitions of his pictures were held in London after his death. For biog., see HALL, T. CAINE, and KNIGHT, JOSEPH, supra, and SHARP, WILLIAM, infra. 1. Poems, Lon., 1870, p. 8vo.

"In no poems is the spontaneous and habitual interpenetration of matter and manner, which is the essence of poetry, more complete than in these. An original and subtile beauty of execution expresses the deep mysticism of thought which in some form and degree is not wanting certainly to any poets of the modern school, but which in Mr. Rossetti's work is both great in degree and passionate in kind. Nor in him has it any tendency to lose itself amid allegory or abstractions; indeed, instead of turning human life into symbols of things vague and not understood, it rather gives to the very symbols the personal life and variety of mankind. No poem in this book is without the circle of this realizing mysticism, which deals wonderingly with all real things that can have poetic life given them by passion, and refuses to have to do with any invisible things that in the wide scope of its imagination cannot be made perfectly distinct and poetically real."—WILLIAM MORRIS: Acad., i. 199.

2. Ballads and Sonnets, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

"The supernatural element of poetry . . . finds here an expression as genuine, as unadulterated with the self-conscious knowingness of a scientific age, as if the poems had been written in the time of Shakspeare, or even in the time of Roger Bacon. Here perhaps is Mr. Rossetti's distinctive and most prominent place in the literature of our time. What other people try to do and fail to do—give a poetic embodiment to the 'eerie' mood of nature as she lies dreaming of man's destiny—Mr. Rossetti does with so much apparent ease that he scarcely seems to try at all."—Ath., No. 2815.

3. Collected Works. Edited, with Preface and Notes, by William M. Rossetti. 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (Includes, besides the contents of former volumes, here newly arranged, pieces and fragments in prose and verse, some reprinted from periodicals, and others previously unpublished.)

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Perhaps the most obvious positive characteristic of Mr. Rossetti's poetry is its picturesqueness. He is not merely a painter and a poet, but a painter-poet, which is a different thing. . . . His imagination is so concrete that its creations always present themselves to him as things of form and colour, and his sonnets spread themselves out like fair paintings on the walls of the gallery of the mind. . . For sonnet craftsmanship which realizes the ideal, which leaves us with the pleasant languor of complete satisfaction, the delicious drowsiness of fulfilled delight, we know of nothing comparable to these great gifts which we owe to Dante Gabriel Rossetti."—J. A. NOBLE: Contemporary Review, xxxviii. 469.

"Falling back upon Milton's well-worn epithets, in his letter to Master Hartlib 'On Education,' we protest that the poetry of these 'Sonnets' is neither 'simple, sensuous,' nor 'passionate.' That the language is too often fraught with what Sir Hugh Evans would call 'affectations' is a matter of small moment, and verbal criticism just now is as far as possible from our thoughts. But the ideas are, for nine-tenths of the subject-matter, far too fine and subtle. Love strong as death is, rightly and naturally enough, the staple of such a series, and with Mr. Rossetti love is lord of all. He 'sighs like a furnace,'—there is no mistake at all about that; but are his sonnets really passionate? In our belief they are not."—Spectator, lv. 269.

"Sonnets . . . unexampled in the English language since Shakespeare's for depth of thought and skill and felicity of execution."—WILLIAM MORRIS: Acad., i. 199.

"Dante Gabriel Rossetti is not only one of the great poets of the century, but the one English poet whose sonnet-work can genuinely be weighed in the balance with that of Shakespeare and with that of Wordsworth. No influence is at present more marked than his: its stream is narrower than that of Tennyson and Browning, but the current is deep, and its fertilizing waters have penetrated far into the soil. . . . It has taken time for the growth of widespread admiration of the sonnet-work of this most imaginative of all the Victorian poets. There are already not a few among the best judges who consider him the greatest sonneteer of our language, his sonnets having 'the fundamental brain-work' of Shakespeare's, the beauty of Mrs. Browning's, the dignity and occasionally, the sunlit transparency of Wordsworth's, with a more startling and impressive vehemence, a greater voluminousness of urgent music."—WILLIAM SHARP: Sonnets of this Century, Introduction and Notes, lxxi. and 317.

Rossetti, Maria Francesca, 1827–1876, sister of Christina and G. C. D. Rossetti, supra; b. in London, and educated at home; was a teacher of languages and history. In 1873 she entered the Anglican Sisterhood of All Saints. 1. A Shadow of Dante: being an Essay towards studying Himself, his World, and his Pilgrimage, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo; new ed., 1881.

"A book which is not only delightful in itself to read, but is admirably adapted as an encouragement to those students who wish to obtain a preliminary survey of the land before they attempt to follow Dante through his long and arduous pilgrimage."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 690.

The Complete Poetical Works of Percy Bysshe Shelley: the Text carefully revised: with Notes and a Memoir; new ed., Lon., 1878, 3 vols. p. 8vo. (The 1st ed. is mentioned ante, vol. ii.)

"On the whole it might not be unfair, while warmly commending both editions as admirable contributions to English literature, to say that Mr. Forman's will be more appreciated by students and specialists, but Mr. Rossetti's by the general public."—E. W. GOSSE: Acad., xiii. 273.

He is a contributor to the Nineteenth Century and other leading periodicals. 1. A History of Music, Lon., 1885–87, 3 vols. 8vo. (The first vol. treats of "Prehistoric Music" and the music of the Assyrians, Egyptians, Hebrews, Chinese, Indo-Chinese, and other Mongoloids; the second, of the music of the Greeks to the time of Sophocles; the third, of later Greek music, and the music of the Christian era as far as the time of Guido d'Arezzo.)

"To all such as have patience to follow the ingenious author in his patient efforts 'to piece music together bit by bit,' we can promise an ample fund of curious and interesting information, set forth in a style that is always picturesque and animated, and rises at times to an eloquence born of the writer's unquenchable enthusiasm for his subject."—Spectator, lix. 1359.

Ruskin, John, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add..] was re-elected to the Slade professorship of art at Oxford in 1876; retired, on account of a severe illness, in 1878; was again elected in 1883, when his inaugural lecture was received with unprecedented enthusiasm, and the attendance at his course was so great that he undertook to repeat each lecture. He resigned the professorship in 1885, and has since resided chiefly at Brantwood, on Coniston Lake. In 1871 he endowed a school of drawing in the Taylorian Museum at Oxford, and in the same year founded the order of St. George, of which he is master. The circulation of his works has been very large in recent years, the sale in England in 1886 amounting to £8000. The following list includes some works of an early period not mentioned ante, vol. ii., but is probably incomplete. 1. The Laws of Fésole: a Familiar Treatise on the Elementary Principles and Practice of Drawing and Painting, as determined by the Tuscan Masters: arranged for the Use of Schools: vol. i., (four parts,) Orpington, 1877–79.

"In the centre of Florence the last great work of native Etruscan architecture, her Baptistery, and the most perfect work of Christian architecture, her Campanile, stand within a hundred paces of each other; and from the foot of that Campanile the last conditions of design which preceded the close of Christian art are seen in the dome of Brunelleschi. Under the term 'Laws of Fésole,' therefore, may be most strictly and accurately arranged every principle of Art, practised at its purest source, from the twelfth to the fifteenth century inclusive."—Author's Preface.

28. Notes by Mr. Ruskin on his Drawings by the late J. M. W. Turner, R.A., exhibited at the Fine Art Society's Galleries, 1878; also an Appendix containing a List of the Engraved Works of J. M. W. Notes on Samuel Prout and William Hunt: Illustrated Edition. (Fine Art Society.) Lon., 1880.

"Mr. Ruskin's 'Notes,' if here and there we take exception to them, are full—are very singularly full—of penetrating comment. . . . And the Fine Art Society has been excellently advised as to the drawings which it was good to reproduce."—FREDERICK WEDMORE: Acad., xviii. 245.

"Mr. John Ruskin . . . has given us, whatever be his errors, almost the only vital art literature of which this nineteenth century can boast, and these 'Notes on Prout and Hunt' are in some ways to be reckoned amongst his very finest work."—Spectator, liii. 1041.

31. Arrows of the Chace: being a Collection of Scattered Letters published chiefly in the Daily Newspapers, 1840–80. Edited by an Oxford Pupil. Orpington, 1880, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Sparkling bits of aphoristic wit and wisdom are scattered in profusion over these letters. even those of which the main tenor is paradoxical or unpractical. Without attempting to deny that many of the social and economical opinions and proposals here put forward are of this unpractical character, I think the reader will nevertheless feel himself stirred and animated in a way in which more sober and well-considered suggestions never move him. Mr. Ruskin does but feel more keenly than the rest of us those evils which spoil and darken the wholesomeness and beauty of modern life. . . . Discussion or argument is not forwarded by such downright denunciation of existing evil as is here found. But we are quickened and invigorated for the struggle in which we are all engaged with the misery of the world, and the sluggish and the selfish may be reached by Mr. Ruskin's random arrows where homilies and exhortations are all in vain."—MARK PATTISON: Acad., xix. 109.

"A collection of Mr. Ruskin's letters de omnibus rebus to the periodical press and to private persons during the last forty years. . . . Concerning the contents of the first volume, which is wholly given up to matters affecting art, there is likely to be comparatively little serious difference of opinion. . . . In many of the points touched upon, time and the writer have proved themselves a match for any two. . . . The most curious and important portion of the book, however, is, beyond all doubt, the second volume, in which the utterances of the author on all sorts of questions unconnected with art are . . . recorded."—Sat. Rev., li. 151.

General Criticism:

"It is simply impossible for the present generation to comprehend what Mr. Ruskin has done for Art. . . . Even those who most reverence him can never realize fully the revolution effected by his first books in the period of indifference and ignorance which prevailed at the time of their publication. . . . His writings came like a revelation. The beauty of his language, the depth of his feelings, the unconventionality of his views, the firmness of his convictions, nay, even his very intolerancy, all tended to rouse attention and interest. His influence has permeated far and wide, and acts now on many who are probably quite unconscious of it and of what they owe him."—Spectator, lxi. 1733.

"At his worst Mr. Ruskin is a better writer than most men; at his best he is incomparable. He has a magnificent vocabulary, a perfect and unerring sense of expression, a wonderful instinct of rhythm. . . . There are few manners in literature at once so affluent and so varied, so copious and so subtle, so capable and so full of refinement, as that of the author of 'Modern Painters.' The reason why it is felt to be so is, we take it, that Mr. Ruskin, in fact, is not only great as a writer, but great as an intelligence and a man. To a mind extraordinarily active yet capacious, extraordinarily vigorous yet subtle; to an imagination unwontedly rich and vivid and splendid, he adds the previous attribute of a noble heart, a sweet and earnest temper, and a boundless good-will. These attributes are perceived in his work, and impart to it, however questionable its aim and however dubitable its conclusions, a certain fine and human quality of reality, which is one secret of its prodigious force."—Ath., No. 2773.

"The cardinal doctrine which runs through all his teaching can be stated in a line. It is that men—men and not the works of men, men and not materials, or machines, or gold, or even pictures, or statues, or public buildings—should be the prime objects of our care, and reverence, and love. Hence it is that, as a writer on art, he necessarily becomes a moralist, since he must needs inquire from what human faculties does this work of art arise, and to what human faculties does it appeal? Hence it is that in the decline of architecture or painting he reads the degradation of national character. Hence it is that the life of the workman appears to him to be of higher importance than the quantity of work which he turns out. Hence it is that he has opposed himself to the orthodox political economy, with a sense that man, and the life and soul of man, cannot be legitimately set aside while we consider apart from these the laws of wealth or of so-called utility. No other truth can be quite so important for our own age, or for any age, as the truth preached so unceasingly and so impressively by Mr. Ruskin."—E. Dowden: Victorian Literature, in Transcripts and Studies, 233.

"Mr. Ruskin's writing will always be looked upon as the one vitalizing force that has knit together into some shape the endless threads of art procedure, and bequeathed forever to artists whatever hope and stimulus can come from external sources."—Spectator, li. 153.

"Should be studied by every one who desires to understand the existing crisis in Ireland. . . . Mr. Russell proposes a radical reform, which, like his descriptions, deserves attentive study. . . . Mr. Russell's scheme is really to fix a standard of rent once for all, to grant the 'three F's' on that standard, and to compel the landlord, on the tenant's demand, to sell to the tenant at twenty-five years' purchase, expressed in three per cent. guaranteed bonds. He would extinguish landlordism by purchase."—Spectator, liv. 18.

He is a Fellow of the Royal Geographical and Asiatic Societies. 1. The Life of Sir James Brooke, Rajah of Sarāwak; from his Personal Papers and Correspondence, Edin. and Lon., 1879, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"He has related with admirable simplicity, clearness, and vigour the story of a life on which Englishmen of future generations will dwell with unalloyed satisfaction and justifiable pride."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 633.

2. Hayti: or, The Black Republic, Lon., 1884, cr. 8vo.

"It is certainly disheartening reading for any believer in the doctrine of development, or for any friend of the African race. The result of twenty years' personal knowledge is the impression that the country is in a state of rapid decadence, and that, in spite of the civilizing elements around them, there is a distinct tendency to sink into the state of an African tribe."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 572.

"This remarkable, terribly honest, and ruthlessly realistic book is not so much a historical and statistical account of Hayti as an indictment against the people that inhabit it,—or shall we say a plea for its annexation by any nation that may claim to itself the Carlylian mission of 'chaining anarchy'? Sir Spenser St. John's object is to prove that Hayti is sunk in misery, bloodshed, cannibalism, and superstition of the most sensual and degrading character; that as an experiment in negro self-government it is a hideous failure; and that yet, bad as its condition now is, still lower deeps of ruin are gaping wide to receive it. . . . It is not difficult to tell how such a book as this is likely ere long—whether rightly or wrongly—to be translated into action. It cannot forever be tolerated that man should be allowed to do his worst in a country for which Nature has done her best."—Spectator, lvii. 1521.

"Mr. Saintsbury's knowledge of French literature is certainly unparalleled among English men of letters, and it is even probable that no French scholar has read so widely, or, we might say, so universally. . . . It is equally indispensable to the student who is required to possess some acquaintance with the topic for educational purposes, and to the scholar whose attention has chiefly been devoted to authors and particular periods."—*Sat. "The author has seen and done many things that are strange to stay-at-home people, and even to those that have been moderately adventurous. But she tells her story simply, without any wish to parade her sagacity or courage. . . . 2. The Caribbean Confederation: a Plan for the Union of the Fifteen British West Indian Colonies, (Cobden Club Pub.,) Lon., 1888, 12mo.

"The general reader will naturally be most interested in the chapters Mr. Salmon devotes to a refutation of many of the statements made by Mr. Froude in his recent work, 'The English in the West Indies.' If Governor Salmon is correct, (and he gives chapter and verse for all that he says,) Mr. Froude's work teems with gross inaccuracies."—Ath., No. 3156.

"The gist of the contention is that, while Mr. Froude considers that the West Indies in general and the negro in particular would benefit by being placed under autocratic but paternal rule, Mr. Salmon would establish at once a scheme of 'local self-government' for every island, with a low franchise to allow the black man to exercise full political rights, so that the control might not be in the hands of a white oligarchy. . . . Mr. Salmon proposes that the fifteen states (including British Guiana and Honduras) comprised in the vast area of the West Indies should send members to a General Assembly in proportion to their population."—*Sat. "Mr. Sanborn's volume may be considered as a vindication, a criticism, a eulogy, or a biography, and in no one of these aspects is it a very successful literary performance. . . . Not a single trait of Thoreau's character, except perhaps his capacity for enduring suffering, is brought out with any distinctness."—Nation, xxxv. 34.

"For the first time we have now the full facts, the correspondence, the contemporary testimony upon which the whole story rests. These have been collected with unwearying care, and are reproduced with a fulness of detail that would be excessive but for the historic interest of the subject. . . . Mr. Sanborn's book will always remain the permanent thesaurus of knowledge in regard to John Brown."—Nation, xli. 324.

Their presence, no doubt, has added greatly both to the value and the charm of these volumes; but Poole himself is kept in the foreground, and the reader is made to feel that he was worthy of the position. . . . All the virtues, faults, and foibles that went to make up a notable man are drawn with extraordinary skill and fidelity in this admirable biography."—Ath., No. 3192.

3. Inductive Political Economy: vol. i., Lon., 1887, 8vo.

"Instruire en intéressant is the device and design of this volume. Begin with real facts and actual cases, then bring in principles and definitions by way of reference. This method is applied to a variety of subjects. . . . The condition and treatment of the poor occupies a considerable part of the book. . . . 'Mr. Herbert Spencer's Barbarism' is the subject and title of one chapter. . . . A more technical part of social science is treated in the essay on 'The Depression of Trade.' . . . Faithful to his motto, he is always interesting and generally instructive."—F. Y. EDGEWORTH: Acad, xxxii. 299.

Sargent, Nathan, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1794–1875, b. at Pultney, Vt.; admitted to the bar 1816; held successively several offices at Washington, including that of commissioner of customs 1861–67; was Washington correspondent of the United States Gazette, and wrote under the pseudonyme of "Oliver Oldschool." Public Men and Events, from the Commencement of Mr. Monroe's Administration in 1817 to the Close of Mr. Fillmore's Administration in 1853, Phila., 1875, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Belongs to that useful and popular class of works which consist mainly of personal reminiscences, and which thus rank among the best of historical materials. It is at the same time so arranged and so combined with other materials as to form a pretty complete political history of the period which it embraces."—Nation, xx. 427.

Sartoris, Mrs. Adelaide, 1814–1879, daughter of Charles Kemble, and sister of Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble, supra; achieved celebrity as an opera-singer in Italy and England, but retired from the stage on her marriage to Frederick Sartoris in 1843. 1. A Week in a French Country-House, Lon., 1867, p. 8vo.

"There is character enough displayed, there is incident enough, expressed or understood, in this thin volume to set up a score of the pursy and inflated novels of the 'Lady Audley' school. . . . Such a nosegay of originals, perhaps, was never bound up in a country-house within the small space of seven days."—Ath., No. 2074.

In 1876 he became Professor Max Müller's deputy in the chair of comparative philology at Oxford. He became a member of the Old Testament Revision Company in 1874, and has contributed largely to the journals of learned societies and to periodicals. 1. An Assyrian Grammar for Comparative Purposes, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo. 2. The Astronomy and Astrology of the Babylonians, 1874. 3. The Principles of Comparative Philology, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo; 2d ed., rev. and enl., 1875; 3d ed., enl., 1885.

"We find, as we must in all Mr. Sayce's writings in which his unique knowledge of Assyrian has any part, much that is suggestive and likely to lead to considerable modifications of preconceived ideas."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 329.

"Whatever may be the final judgment of scholars on Mr. Sayce's distinctive theories, the book in which he has set them forth is exceedingly attractive, and cannot be neglected by any student of comparative philology."—Acad., x. 167.

"Mr. Sayce has furnished to the scientific world what has long been a want,—namely, a definite and systematic analysis of the main relationships of Assyrian to the other languages of the Semitic family."—Ath., No. 2620.

7. Babylonian Literature: Lectures at the Royal Institution, Lon., 1877, 8vo. 8. Introduction to the Science of Language, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"In these two volumes Mr. Sayce attempts 'to give a systematic account of the science of language, its nature, its progress, and its aims, which shall be at the same time as thorough and exhaustive as our present knowledge and materials allow.'"—Ath., No. 2763.

"It is truly an 'Introduction' to the science of language, although perhaps it is something of a Germanism to call an essay which first attempts to lay down the ultimate laws and conditions of the science, and to vindicate its right to exist, and then passes in rapid survey the mutual relations of the many families of language, an introduction to it. . . . But the German Einleitung is not generally delivered to mere beginners, but to students who are already familiar with many details of the subject under discussion, and is intended to guide them to a large philosophical view of the bases, the extension, the limitations and conditions of the same. This is essentially the function which Professor Sayce's work attempts with the science of language, and which his large experience on many widely different fields of language of all ages, and his sound principles, both of induction and of deduction, have enabled him to discharge with rare, if not unique, ability."—Spectator, liii. 464.

"It is all of a piece. If its mutually hostile half-views were allowed to cancel one another, its whole foundation of linguistic philosophy would drop out of it. We know not where to point out in it any doctrine that is clearly apprehended, distinctly put forth, and consistently maintained."—W. D. WHITNEY: Nation, xxx. 329.

9. The Ancient Hebrew Inscription discovered at the Pool of Siloam in Jerusalem, Lon., 1881. 10. Herodotus, I.–III., (The Ancient Empires of the East:) with Notes, Introduction, and Appendices, Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"In his Introduction, which will probably attract more general attention than any other twenty pages in the volume, Prof. Sayce draws up the most tremendous indictment against Herodotus that was ever launched by modern critic against the reputation of a dead and gone scribe. . . . No apologist need ever more hope to rebuild the reputation which now crumbles to dust before the destructive logic of Dr. Weidemann (Geschichte Aegyptens von Psammetich I. bis auf Alexander den Grossen) and the merciless indictment of Prof. Sayce."—AMELIA B. EDWARDS: Acad., xxiv. 323.

"Mr. Sayce has a very good right to his opinion, as he has travelled over most of the lands described by Herodotus, as he can read inscriptions which were to Herodotus mere hopeless puzzles, and as he enjoys all the advantages of modern criticism. Yet we could wish he was less hard on Herodotus, whom he seems to regard more as 'the Father of Lies' than as the 'Father of History.' . . . His remarks are invariably readable, and even vivacious, and, however much we may dissent from his opinions, they are opinions which no one can afford to neglect. But, from the language of Herodotus to the latest Hittite inscription, how obscure do these topics remain!"—Sat. Rev., lvi. 507.

"What he has to say always betokens ample familiarity with the latest research, and often ingenuity. . . . "The intrinsic value of the document scarcely justifies the amount of writing it has called forth, particularly in England and America. . . . It proved to be moral rather than dogmatic in tone, touching upon conduct and customs, the rites and administration of early churches, without asserting a distinctive theology. . . . The volume is a monument of comprehensive knowledge and careful elaboration. Like all Dr. Schaff's books, it is characterized by the extensive erudition which a laborious German scholar may be supposed to possess. His critical power, however, is small, and orthodox theories are a little too prominent." —Ath., No. 3026.

Schliemann, Heinrich, 1822–1890, b. at Ankershagen, Mecklenburg; became a grocer's assistant at the age of fourteen; in 1846 was sent to St. Petersburg as the agent of a Dutch commercial house, and, having established a business of his own and accumulated a considerable fortune, determined in 1863 to devote himself to archæological researches. After several years spent in travelling in different parts of the world and in a course of preliminary study at Paris, he began in 1871 the explorations at Hissarlik, the supposed site of ancient Troy, which resulted in discoveries that aroused a strong interest not only among scholars but with the general public, which was increased by his similar excavations at Mycenæ, begun in 1874, and by further explorations at Hissarlik. From 1883 he made his permanent residence at Athens. He had become a naturalized citizen of the United States during a short stay in California in 1850, and he made several subsequent visits to America. In 1868 he published, in French and German, a work on Ithaca, the Peloponnesus, and Troy, and in 1874 a work on Troy and its Remains, in German, which was translated into English by Miss L. Dora Schmitz, (q. v., infra.) The later works enumerated below have appeared without any mention of a translator, and are therefore presumed to have been originally written in English, or to have been translated by the author himself. 1. Duffield: with Maps, Plans, and about Eighteen Hundred Illustrations, Lon., 1880, imp. 8vo.

"'Ilios' is perhaps the worst arranged book that ever came under our notice. Admirable as a discoverer, a digger, a diviner of ancient sites, Dr. Schliemann is an astonishingly bad writer. . . . We do not find fault with Dr. Schliemann for not being an accomplished scholar or a trained archæologist. He is something better: he is a man of real genius. No one but a genius could have lived the life Dr. Schliemann describes in his autobiography, keeping always before his eyes the ideal of Homeric research. . . . But his discoveries are one thing and his new book quite another. . . . We must admit that Dr. Schliemann has hardly given himself a fair chance as a writer. He is entangled helplessly in the ranks of his allies and camp-followers."—Sat. Rev., li. 55.

"Mr. Iron has followed no recognized model of romance, but contrives to tell his tale in a series of studies illustrating the wild life of an ostrich farm, and setting before the reader with striking vigour the problems which trouble a strong intelligence and an imaginative ambition remote from any possibility of culture. His descriptions are wonderfully graphic, and his pathos is forcible."—Ath., No. 2888.

"More than any other of the biographers of the series he approaches the life which he narrates from the twofold point of view of history and practical politics. . . . In this book we have, therefore, what is really a political history of the United States, based upon the public life of Henry Clay. . . . But its literary merit is equally great. . . . It is a true biography, written in a style which carries the reader along by the very interest of the narrative."—Nation, xliv. 536.

Schuyler, Eugene, Ph.D., LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1840–1890, b. at Ithaca, N.Y.; graduated at Yale 1859, and at Columbia Law School 1863; entered the U.S. diplomatic service 1866; held various consulships; was secretary of legation at St. Petersburg 1870–76, minister resident and consul-general to Greece, Servia, and Roumania 1882–84, and appointed consul-general in Egypt shortly before his death. 1. Turkistan: Notes of a Journey in 1873 in the Russian Province of Turkistan, the Khanates of Khokan and Bokhara, and the Provinces of Kuldja. Maps and Illust. N. York, 1876, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"An excellent knowledge of the Russian language and life, and a wide-reaching acquaintance among the official class of Russia, gave Mr. Schuyler command of facilities beyond those of most travellers; and while his consular experience may be supposed to have fitted him for studying the political and commercial aspects of the Asiatic problems, his nationality enabled him to exercise an impartiality one could hardly look for in a European."—Nation, xxiv. 76.

"Mr. Schuyler, by travel and adventure, by intercourse with various classes of people, and by the use of official documents, unpublished records, and private letters, has produced two volumes which for some time to come may fairly rank as works of constant reference on a question which no Englishman should regard without interest, and yet which few can approach without prejudice."—*Sat. "In the work before us there is no rounded picture of either Peter, his nation, or his time, but Peter, his nation, and his time are made to pass before us in successive attitudes, actions, and stages, in chronological order, and the reader is left to judge and combine. . . . Mr. Schuyler had before him an immense literature from which to draw materials. . . . He has availed himself of these resources with extraordinary diligence, extracting from biographies, memoirs, diaries, correspondence, and records of all kinds an amount of particulars sufficient to give a fulness to each separate subdivision of his subject, and vastly more than sufficient for the general characterization. And herein lie both the strength and the weakness of Mr. Schuyler's work. The division and arrangement of his matter are excellent, and there is order in the whole and symmetry in the parts; but the fulness of the parts makes the whole heavy, though clearness is everywhere preserved in spite of the great crowding of facts. . . . Its profusely varied, highly characteristic, and not seldom charming illustrations will make it an attractive addition to every library."—Nation, xxxviii. 389.

It is superfluous to recommend it to the notice of English biographers and county historians, for to them it becomes, by reason of the thoroughly genuine and discriminating way in which it has been written, almost a necessity."—Ath., No. 2581.

"The first part of the essay deals chiefly with the current theories of the origin of commoners' rights in England. Mr. Scrutton seems to prefer the view that they began in almost every case with an actual grant from a Norman land-owner. . . . The second part of the work . . . contains a lucid and well-sustained account of the policy of the legislation and the practice of the land-owners with regard to enclosures. Seebohm, Frederic, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] now a member of a banking firm at Hitchin, Hertfordshire. 1. On International Reform, Lon., 1871, 8vo.

"This essay, written during the American civil war, is only now given to the public. . . . It seeks . . . to show that the greater part of the relations among sovereign States are still not governed by any rules deserving the name of law; that the want of any such government is a grievous hindrance to the intercourse of nations, and that the necessity for establishing some kind of order is daily becoming more imperious."—Spectator, xliv. 737.

"Mr. Seebohm has gone to work somewhat upon the principle of the naturalist who reconstructs an extinct animal from a single bone. He has begun by studying the remains of the open field system in his own township of Hitchin, and from thence has proceeded to build up a history of the system throughout England. This study from the life, as one may say, gives his work an especial value. His facts will be welcome even to those who hesitate at accepting conclusions which cut at the root of many a cherished belief in the primitive freedom of the English race. . . . We must acknowledge that Mr. Seebohm has made a most valuable contribution to historic study."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 311.

"Whatever may be the ultimate view which may be adopted as to the origin of the English, and of the English village community and the universality of the manorial system, there is no doubt that the whole subject must be reconsidered in the light of the new facts and new arguments brought to bear on it in this book."—Spectator, lvi. 1380.

"He certainly has been the first to make it clearly understood what the system of cultivation and landholding really was."—W. J. ASHLEY: Introduction to English Economic History and Theory, 5.

"It is difficult, indeed, to over-estimate the importance of Mr. Seebohm's new contribution to one of the most vexed questions in English history. We think that he does not allow . . . sufficient scope for the evidence of comparative law and history. . . . But, setting aside these and the other questions we have raised, the broad fact remains that the village community is by Mr. Seebohm brought within the range of Roman influence; and this fact once permanently proved must assuredly lead up to some conclusions with regard to early English history which will, on the whole, follow the lines of Mr. Coote rather than those of Mr. Freeman."—Ath., No. 2910.

"The question, as he propounds it, is whether the conquerors of England founded or revived a society of lords and serfs, or whether they constructed the State on the principles of freedom and equality. If answered in one way, our English economic history must begin with free village communities, which gradually degenerated into the serfdom of the Middle Ages; 'if answered in the other way, it begins with the serfdom of the masses of the rural population under Saxon rule, a serfdom from which it has taken one thousand years of English economic evolution to set them free.' He prefers the latter view, and concludes that a manorial system existed in this country while still a province of the Empire, which was either adopted or revived by a German people who were familiar with the ancient civilization. . . . We shall all require evidence of a much wider and more stringent kind before we acknowledge that our manorial system and common field industry were derived from Roman influence."—CHARLES I. ELTON: Acad., xxiv. 153.

"The most exhaustive and lucid account of this system that has ever been made. . . . Mr. Seebohm . . . shows by overpowering evidence that the English village community was a servile community at every one of the stages by which he traces it back from the latter part of the Middle Ages to the sixth and seventh centuries."—Nation, xxxviii. 78.

"The lectures on Roman Imperialism are a really good survey of the period of history with which they have to do. . . . Altogether there is a great deal of matter for thought in Mr. Seeley's volume; but the beginning and the end are strangely incongruous with one another."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 23.

2. Life and Times of Stein; or, Germany and Prussia in the Napoleonic Age, Cambridge, 1878, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1884.

"He has chosen, and fairly chosen, Stein as the protagonist of his drama, and has combined a minute biography of one statesman of the epoch with sketches of a great number who clustered round him or came in contact with him, and with disquisitions on the leading events and political complications of the period. His work has all the merits and defects of this plan. It furnishes at once a complete biography, a repertory of information, and a manual of sensible discussion. . . . The book answers the purpose of a biographical encyclopædia of all the eminent Germans who played a part in the political history of the early years of the present century. . . . The work has also defects which do not arise from its plan. The first of these defects is its enormous prolixity. . . . The second defect of the book is a certain flabbiness of style."—*Sat. 3. Natural Religion. By the Author of "Ecce Homo." Lon., 1882, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"If it be the function of genius to interpret the age to itself, this is a work of genius. It gives articulate expression to the higher strivings of the time. It puts plainly the problem of these latter days, and so far contributes to its solution; a positive solution it scarcely claims to supply."—Ath., No. 2857.

4. The Expansion of England: Two Courses of Lectures, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"Unusually solid and weighty, and should be read by all who study history, not for the mere love of romance or of antiquarianism, but for its bearing on 'practical politics.' . . . The least pleasant feature of the book is its author's appearance of contempt for all methods but his own. . . . This touch of literary arrogance, and a tendency to repetition, both of thought and phraseology, . . . are about the only faults we have to find."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 448.

5. A Short History of Napoleon the First, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"He is exact, impartial, and, above all, judicious, so that if the results of his researches had not been evaporated down to too impalpable a residuum of facts, his would have been the definite English word on Napoleon for some time to come."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 156.

"A 'short history of Napoleon,' in which 'everything is subordinated to clearness and unity,' prefixed to an 'Essay' on Napoleon which makes no 'attempt either to analyze his character or estimate his genius,' is Professor Seeley's own description of the volume before us. The 'History' 'incorporates the substance' of an article published some years ago in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica;' the 'Essay' is 'entirely new.' . . . Professor Seeley's view . . . of what he calls Napoleon's plan . . . is as follows: . . . 'His aim was to fight out the great quarrel with England which had occupied France throughout the eighteenth century, to avenge and repair the losses France had suffered in Canada, in India, and on all the seas.' . . . We cannot . . . accept Professor Seeley's favourite formula as adequately expressing Napoleon's 'plan.'"—Spectator, lix. 150.

Shaftesbury, Earl of. See COOPER.

Shairp, John Campbell, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1819–1885, b. in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, and educated at Glasgow and Oxford; became professor of humanity at the University of St. Andrews in 1861, and principal of the United College of St. Salvator and St. Leonard in the University of St. Andrews in 1869. In 1877 he was elected professor of poetry at Oxford. For biog., see KNIGHT, REV. WILLIAM, supra. The following list of his publications includes the one mentioned ante, vol. ii. 1. The Wants of the Scottish Universities, and some of the Remedies, 1856. Pamph. 2. The Uses of the Study of Latin Literature, (Introductory Lecture at the United College of St. Salvator and St. Leonard,) 1858. 3. "He is . . . quite in accord with Mr. Arnold in his rejection of the utilitarian view of education, and in making the perfection of our nature consist in the harmonious development of all its capacities. But he quarrels with him for advocating a culture which must become practically 'a principle of exclusion and isolation,' unattainable by the many, and for assigning to religion a secondary place."—*Sat. 7. (Ed.) Recollections of a Tour made in Scotland, A.D. 1803. By Dorothy Wordsworth. Edin., 1874, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1875.

"The descriptions, though very plain in expression, are made with something of a purpose. . . . As a painter jots down rough memoranda in a sketch-book which may give him hints for future composition, Miss Wordsworth is always accumulating possible suggestions for her brother's work. . . . There is very little fine writing, but those parts [points?] are selected for notice which would tell in poetry."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 248.

8. On Poetic Interpretation of Nature, Edin., 1877, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"The man or the woman who would understand Professor Shairp's book must bring to it a mind already in keen sympathy with his subject. For such he has provided a true intellectual feast. Young students, to whom he especially addresses himself, will find themselves here in communion with a mind which places its rich resources at their disposal."—Spectator, l. 951.

9. Robert Burns, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"The only defect we have observed in this very thoughtful and truthful life of Burns . . . is that it hardly gives sufficient sense of the buoyancy and tumult in the temper of the great peasant-poet of Scotland,—that it wants a little more animation. The criticism on his poetry and on his life is admirable, and the latter certainly not too severe."—Spectator, lii. 627.

10. Aspects of Poetry: being Lectures delivered at Oxford, Oxf., 1881, p. 8vo.

"It is impossible not to compare these lectures with those of Professor Shairp's predecessor,—the greatest English critic of his age,—Mr. Matthew Arnold. In many respects they suffer, but in a few they certainly gain, by the comparison. . . . They do more, we think, to enhance the charm of the poets with whom they deal than Mr. Arnold's essays did. They do less to signalize particular aspects of those poets, and to present them in unexpected lights. They are less artistic, less finished, more human, and, on the whole, we think, more eloquent."—Spectator, lv. 88.

"Shairp's poems are healthy as the air they breathe, the air of Ross and Inverness, but pervaded by a spirit of soft regret, in no wise morbid, for a lost past, when the Highland glens were still uncleared. . . . They are saturated with a passion for wild and mountainous scenery; they smell of the heather."—Acad., xxxiii. 318.

"Of those who have undertaken the several aspects or portions of their friend's life it were needless to say more than that none fitter could be chosen, nor can any fault be found with the manner in which each has discharged his task. . . . The copious letters and journals left by Forbes himself . . . have contributed a mass of interesting facts and traits of character."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 791.

"They are the sermons of one who has felt very profoundly the collision between the scientific and the theological ideas of the present day, and who has no slight amount of sympathy with both, and entirely believes that there is no real contradiction between them. They are the sermons, too, of a man endowed with no small amount of eloquence, and with that complete sincerity which is the first condition of treating matters of this kind with anything like success."—Spectator, lii. 406.

"The editor has gone far afield, sparing neither time nor labour in studying, discovering, and comparing sonnets which may be counted by hundreds. He has composed a suggestive treatise on the history, structure, artistic capacity, and various species of this poem. Short biographical notices of all the writers included in this volume have been written, those which deal with living persons being marked by a happy mixture of frankness and sympathy. . . . Working thus, Mr. Sharp has produced a sonnet-book which represents the best craftsmanship of the nineteenth century."—Acad., xxix. 103.

T. Sherman as general-in-chief 1883. Personal Memoirs, N. York, 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

"As a book for general reading, Sheridan's Memoirs have attractive features that will insure success. The narrative is clear and lively, the events described are important in themselves, and the personality of the hero is always interesting. . . . For purposes of permanent history, one could wish that the aim had been less popular and more critical; but a long narrative by so distinguished an officer in a great war cannot lack value, even when the narrative is cursory and superficial."—Nation, xlviii. 100.

"Although it is a capital defect of Mr. Sherman's make-up as a financier that he is a politician of the canny sort,—finance not being amenable in the slightest degree to the exigencies of politics,—it must be admitted that his diagnosis of the economic condition of the country from time to time was singularly accurate, so that we cannot recall the name of any public man whose judgments were oftener verified by the subsequent course of events."—Nation, xxviii. 337.

2. Memoirs. By Himself. N. York, 1875, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The style is generally direct and clear, having the prime merit of telling plainly what the writer had seen and felt vividly, and consequently the sympathy of the reader goes strongly with him to the end. . . . The 'March to the Sea' will always have a romantic interest to the readers of American history, and Sherman's narrative of it is perhaps the most attractive part of his book. . . . The treatment of his personal relations to others is, throughout, the vulnerable part of General Sherman's book. . . . He too often forgets the rule that the facts should be stronger than the epithets applied to them."—Nation, xx. 411.

"The narrative is clear and concise, and four years of military operations on a gigantic scale are described in fewer words than are required by some authors in writing the history of a couple of battles. The style is, however, full of slang and vulgarisms. We expected something better from one who has received the excellent education of West Point."—Ath., No. 2490.

"Here is a volume to excite attention indeed. Harmony is really to be effected between Science and Religion at last. And not only is the venerable dispute to be settled, but it is to be settled by methods exclusively American, we are told: 'The American geography, genealogy, politics, and religion are simply unparalleled, either in ancient or modern civilization, and together form an aggregate of all that is peculiar to the civilizations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. Such a medley of climates, of races, of institutions, of creeds and theories, fusing under one political system, affords materials for a philosophy which cannot but be final, and by projecting on a grander scale, and with fuller conditions, all the time-worn issues of history, shows that here, if anywhere, the old terrestrial problem is at length to be solved.'"—Nation, xxviii. 18.

(An edition of 100 copies for private circulation had been printed at Birmingham in 1880.)

"If it had much less to offer than it has, much less charm of style and description, and many fewer pathetic and touching incidents, the character of John Inglesant alone would win for it a sympathetic circle of readers. . . . The peculiar religious tone and temper which belonged to the finer and more poetical minds in the Tractarian movement . . . finds here delicate and beautiful interpretation."—Sat. Rev., lii. 50.

"The Italy of Milton's day, its superstition and its scepticism, and the sophistry that strove to make the two as one; its monks and its bravoes; its processions and its pantomimes; its cult of the Passion and its cult of Paganism; the opulence of its past and the impotence of its present; will be found depicted by sympathetic genius in the second volume of 'John Inglesant.'"—R. "Twenty-six papers are included in the collection. Of these a great majority are anatomical in substance, if not in name; a few are concerned with the physiological action and therapeutic uses of certain narcotics. . . . All are marked by the distinguishing qualities of the author's mind,—unwearied industry and what may almost be called a passion for accuracy and precision of statement, even when this does not seem to be called for by the intrinsic importance of the matter in hand. . . . The short biographical notice of the author is a model of its kind."—Acad., xix. 430.

"It claims to be an examination, at once expository and critical, of the different methods of obtaining reasoned convictions as to what ought to be done which are to be found—either explicit or implicit—in the moral consciousness of mankind generally, and which, from time to time, have been developed, either singly or in combination, by individual thinkers and worked up into systems now historical."—Author's Preface.

"Mr. Sidgwick, inverting Aristotle's phrase, proposes as his end knowledge, not practice, and adopts the impartial and scientific treatment of a German psychologist. He is neither the advocate nor the assailant, but the investigator. And it may be that this kind of originality, the originality of method, is all the originality he would himself claim for his treatise. He has no new theory to propound, nor does he offer any novel array of argument in support of any one of the standard theories. Yet . . . we have in reading Mr. Sidgwick's pages a sense of that originality which may be imparted to any subject by its being handled in its whole extent and expounded in all its breadth by a powerful mind, a mind which has not only mastered it in all its details, but informed them with its own life."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 118.

3. The Principles of Political Economy, Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"Mr. Sidgwick begins his book by speaking of a recent reaction against the claims of political economy to be regarded as an established science. This reaction he considers 'inevitable and even salutary,' but at the same time as carried too far. . . . It is unquestionably the weightiest book on the subject which has appeared in this country for some time."—Acad., xxiii. 339.

Siemens, Sir Charles William, Ph.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S., 1823–1883, b. at Leuthe, Hanover; educated at Lübeck, Magdeburg, and Göttingen; went to London in 1843, and, with his brother Werner, engaged in various enterprises, manufacturing the Siemens' steel by a process of their own invention, and taking out numerous patents for electrical apparatus and other scientific inventions. They laid the direct United States cable in 1874 with the steamer "Faraday," which was built for the purpose from designs by C. W. Siemens, who was knighted in recognition of his scientific services in 1883. He was president of the Society of Telegraph Engineers, of the Institute of Mechanical Engineers, of the Midland Institute, and, in 1882, of the British Association, and contributed numerous papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society, &c. "This volume contains a reprint of Sir Wm. Siemens' original paper on the 'Conservation of Solar Energy,' communicated to the Royal Society early in 1882, and a number of criticisms and discussions to which that paper gave rise. . . . The wide-spread interest which has been taken in the new theory, and the fact that fresh evidence will probably be brought forward and fresh discussions follow in connection with it, are a sufficient justification for the republication of these papers in a collected form. . . . Sir W. Siemens' theory suggests a solution of the difficulty, a solution at once ingenious and well considered."—Acad., xxiv. 82.

4. Scientific Works: a Collection of Papers and Discussions. Edited by E. F. Bamber, C.E. Lon., 1888, 3 vols. 8vo.

"What most strikes us in opening the volumes here and there at random is the extreme lucidity of Sir William Siemens's style both as a writer and speaker. Not only is each statement clear in itself, but the arrangement of matter and order of thought are precisely what are required for luminous exposition. The papers include explanations of his own inventions, together with presidential addresses and popular lectures."—Ath., No. 3216.

"This is in effect an attempt, ingenious and not unskilful, but very much the reverse of convincing, to prove that the world would go on pretty much as it has done if society made up its mind that there is no God. . . . The only thing obscure and vague in Miss Simcox's volume is her notion of religion as continuing to subsist after it has been conclusively established that there is no God. In a general way, she takes help from Mr. Matthew Arnold's ideas of religion as morality plus emotion, and of God as the not-ourselves that makes for righteousness. . . . In point of fact, Miss Simcox has herself more thinking power, in the sense of decisively discriminating between fact and not-fact, between substance and shadow, than Mr. Arnold, and must perceive, if she looks with her usual penetration, that his religious philosophy is mere coloured mist."—Spectator, l. 1478.

Imagine Mrs. Carlyle softened by a good deal more tenderness and stimulated by a French education, and you get a fair idea of Madame Mohl."—Spectator, lx. 799.

She has also edited the following works from the manuscripts left by her father: 1. Journals kept in France and Italy from 1848 to 1852: with a Sketch of the Revolution of 1848, Lon., 1871, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Senior knew intimately many of the best men on the Continent, and gathered from their lips not only accounts of things done, but guesses at what would next be done, together with a great deal of miscellaneous and amusing information; he not only put what he heard in writing, but he frequently induced his informants and gossips to revise what he had written: so that he was a sort of recording angel of his wide political and social circle."—Spectator, xlv. 80.

"The Revolution of 1848 and the coup d'état have now a literature of their own, and consequently there is little that is absolutely new in these journals; . . . while most of the conversations with M. de Tocqueville on French affairs are reserved for separate publication. . . . Undoubtedly, however, the book has a genuine historical value."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 19.

"Some of Mr. Senior's journals have been published, and other parts of the series were at different times freely circulated in manuscript; but the present selection, edited with remarkable skill and judgment by Mrs. Simpson, is extraordinarily full and interesting."—Sat. Rev., xlvi. 53.

4. Conversations with Distinguished Persons during the Second Empire, from 1860 to 1863, Lon., 1880, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The journals now published are the last which Mr. Senior wrote. Their style and matter display his highest point of perfection in a branch of literature which he may almost be said to have invented."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 252.

5. Conversations and Journals in Egypt and Malta, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Senior's reports of the language of French statesmen and politicians were not inaptly named the book of unfulfilled prophecy. The interest of his Egyptian journal is of a different kind; for, with the exception of M. de Lesseps, scarcely any of his informants professed to make any forecast of the future, except that it was hopeless."—*Sat. Sinnett, Alfred Percy, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1840, in London; son of E. W. P. Sinnett, a journalist and author of several educational works, (d. 1845,) and of Mrs. Percy Sinnett, (ante, vol. ii.;) became a journalist on the staff of the Globe at the age of 19; was afterwards editor of the Hong-Kong Daily Press; returned to England in 1868, and became a leader-writer on the Standard; went to India as editor of the Pioneer, Allahabad, in 1871; became a member of the Theosophical Society in 1879, and in 1882 returned to England, where he is president of the London lodge of that society. 1. Our Policy in China, Lon., 1869, 8vo. 2. The Occult World, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo; 4th ed., 1884.

"The averment is that there is a school of philosophy still in existence of which modern culture has lost sight; and that, while modern metaphysics and modern physical science 'have been groping for centuries after knowledge,' occult philosophy has enjoyed it in full measure all the while. . . . Mr. Sinnett writes in perfect good faith, and 'The Occult World' contains much that is curious and amusing; but we trust the credulity of the public is not to be gauged by his own as exhibited in this book."—Sat. Rev., li. 823.

3. Esoteric Buddhism, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; 5th ed., 1885.

"To ourselves 'Esoteric Buddhism' seems to be a blending of old Brahmanic ideas of Kalpas and 'austerity' with the speculations of American 'Spiritualists' and a dash of scientific terminology. But . . . it is certain that Mr. Sinnett delivers his gospel with much clearness and obvious good faith."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 119.

4. Karma: a Novel, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"Mr. Sinnett is already favourably known in the world of mirth by his serious works in psychical philosophy. As a professed writer of fiction he is less amusing. . . . The characters in his novel are not nearly so droll as those which figure in his philosophy. . . . There is, in fact, a story, though of the dullest kind that has ever been padded out into two volumes. . . . The work as a whole, in spite of its absurdities, is one which only an able, ingenious, and courageous man could have written."—Sat. Rev., lx. 392.

5. United: a Novel, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"If, as we gather from these pages, persons of a most ordinary and unintellectual every-day nature may yet move on a very high psychic plane indeed, so, we suppose, the most transcendental views on occult science may be conveyed in English that is often slipshod, and occasionally vulgar."—Spectator, lix. 1508.

"Mr. Skeat has few rivals in knowledge of the English language and its history; and as for philology, there is no doubt that the root of the matter is in him. Etymology with him is a scientific process, and not a mere series of guesses more or less ingenious and successful. He is well read both in literature and philology, patient, industrious, and painstaking. Accordingly, his dictionary is indispensable to all who would study the English language and its origin scientifically and historically. It is not only a copious résumé of modern philological research in a field which has been diligently and successfully cultivated, but it adds to the labours of others the mature results of Mr. Skeat's own profound studies in the same field."—Ath., No. 2856.

"It is not a mere abridgment, as Mr. Skeat is careful to explain, but has been entirely rewritten. It is arranged on what the author calls 'an unusual but excellent plan.' All the derivatives of a given word are made to follow the original word, but the derivatives are also given in their alphabetical order with a cross-reference to the parent word. The plan is certainly unusual; as to its excellence there will probably be much difference of opinion."—Ath., No. 2856.

The misleading theory of 'root-determinatives' has disappeared, and the laws of vocalism have become far stricter. . . . "The graceful writer who has gained an entrance into many of the most delightful corners of our memory under the name of 'Shirley' is scarcely second to any in his generation. When he comes down out of those pleasant valleys and pathways bordered with classic asphodel, and writes himself 'John Skelton,' discourses upon the Poor-laws, or clears out the encumbered by-ways of history, his work is that of an expert, whom his fellow-workmen of all classes take pleasure to see à l'œuvre, handling his tools with a precision which delights the trade. . . . The new series of the 'Essays of Shirley' now given to the public are of dates varying from 1854 to a very recent period, and consist not of critical and historical studies, like some already issued, but of what the author calls 'Essays in Romance and Studies from Life.' . . . The author has chosen his title well, for it would be inappropriate to assume for these imaginative sketches—the discursiveness and freedom of which are among their chief charms—the character of tales."—Spectator, li. 1497.

It consists essentially of a sketch of Scottish history and life up to the time when Maitland really became a force in both as secretary or minister to Mary Stuart. As such it can hardly be praised too highly as a sustained effort in picturesque description and narrative."—WILLIAM WALLACE: Acad., xxxii. 97.

"Whatever may be thought of Mr. Skelton's views either of the present or the past of Scotland, no reader will lay these volumes down without feeling that he owes the author a debt of gratitude for a book of great research which is very pleasant reading, and at the same time highly stimulative to thought and reflection."—Ath., No. 3182.

"It was Mr. Skene's good fortune to have enjoyed Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's confidence during, and indeed for some years before, the Crimean war. While the allies were besieging Sebastopol he acted as the ambassador's confidential agent at the seat of war. . . . His book will be a very gold-mine to the tellers of good stories, but it has a much higher value. It is a careful record by a keen judge of men and manners of the inner life, so to speak, of the fight in the Crimea, and of the diplomatic struggle which went on side by side with that great passage of arms. . . . The author's style is very simple, very clear, and full of point."—Acad., xxvi. 22.

"Her shorter poems . . . are what her reputation as a poetess chiefly rests on. Throughout these a very noble tone of thought runs; the language is well managed; the forms of verse are treated delicately."—ERIC S. ROBERTSON: English Poetesses, 335.

"We may demur to this or that statement, point out some mistakes; we may see that the book lacks depth, that it shows an insufficient acquaintance with original sources, and that it is almost wholly compiled from second-hand authorities: still the volume is an excellent one for popular perusal. Nobody can read it without interest, without loving and admiring those whose struggles and hardships the author paints so well. . . . If those who are already familiar with the subject find little that is new, they will derive from the narrative a moral stimulus that may be not without advantage."—Ath., No. 2411.

3. Thrift, Lon., 1875, 12mo; new ed., 1883.

"He deals with some of the leading social questions of the day, such as Co-operation and Association. He sketches the sanitary movement, unsparingly satirizes the feminine follies of fashionable circles, and lastly concludes with an admirable essay on what may be called the æsthetics of common life."—Acad., x. 304.

4. Life of a Scotch Naturalist: Thomas Edward, Associate of the Linnæan Society, Lon., 1876, cr. 8vo.

"The biography of this remarkable man owes much of its charm to the manner in which Mr. Smiles has done his part as narrator."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 84.

"It is the record of one who loved Nature not wisely but too well. 'I have been a fool to Nature all my life,' he says; but it is to such fools that Nature reveals herself most unreservedly."—Acad., xi. 107.

5. George Moore, Merchant and Philanthropist, Lon., 1878, 8vo; new ed., 1879, cr. 8vo.

"The charm of the biography is that the man is represented to us without comment or apology, just as he appeared to his associates. If in Mr. Smiles's pages he becomes the centre of his time, and a sort of pivot on which the mercantile and philanthropic life of the country turned, that was precisely what his career appeared to himself. . . . His belief in his power of putting the world right was confirmed by the unchecked prosperity of his private fortunes, which recall the career of Dick Whittington."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 732.

6. Robert Dick, Baker, of Thurso, Geologist and Botanist. Illust. Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"Though it lacks the anecdote and adventure so abundant in his 'Life of a Scotch Naturalist,' it is free from the prolixity of his later work, the 'Life of George Moore,' and is written in his usual easy and pleasant style. . . . The tone of the book is thoroughly fresh and healthy. . . . The portrait of Dick, etched by Rajon, is worthy both of the artist and the subject; the landscapes are little gems of engraving."—*Sat. With Smith, George Adam, Whom to Follow, Gladstone or Beaconsfield, Edin., 1879, 2 parts. Anon. (Part I. is by G. S., and Part II. by G. A. S.)

Smith, George. The Queen's Death, and other Poems, Lon., 1870.

Smith, George, 1840–1876, b. in London, (M. R.,) Cheltenham, (C. C.,) Eng., of poor parents; became a printer in the firm of Messrs. Bradbury & Agnew, and through Sir Henry Rawlinson, (q. v.,) who employed him in the preparation of the third volume of the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, was appointed in 1870 assistant to Dr. Birch, keeper of Oriental Antiquities at the British Museum. In 1873, having previously deciphered an imperfect cuneiform inscription containing a Chaldean account of the deluge, &c., he went to search for the missing fragment on the site of Nineveh, and succeeded in finding it. He made another successful expedition in the following year, and a third in 1875-76, but died at Aleppo on his way home. 1. The History of Assurbanipal: translated from Cuneiform Inscriptions, Lon., 1871, imp. 8vo. 2. The Phonetic Values of the Cuneiform Characters, Lon., 1871, imp. 8vo. 3. Assyrian Discoveries: an Account of Explorations and Discoveries on the Site of Nineveh during 1873 and 1874. Lon., 1875, 8vo; 3d ed. same year.

"Mr. Smith has told the story of his early essays in cuneiform interpretation, and of the expeditions since undertaken by him for the managers of the 'Daily Telegraph' and the trustees of the British Museum, with a modesty of tone as well as with a power of clear and straightforward description such as greatly enhance the charm which the tale of his researches must possess for every reader of thought and taste."—Sat. Rev., xxxix. 190.

"Of the volume before us 164 pages are devoted to Mr. Smith's travels to and fro, and to details of his diggings and of his disputes with the Turks; while the larger and more important part, amounting to about 280 pages, is occupied with the publication and exposition of the Texts he had been instrumental in either finding or completing."—Ath., No. 2463.

"Mr. Smith's book is one of great interest for the scholar as well as for the general public. . . . It is emphatically a record of discoveries, and at the same time a monument of patient perseverance and conquest over difficulties."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., vii. 156.

4. The Assyrian Eponym Canon, from the Death of Solomon to Nebuchadnezzar, Lon., 1875, 8vo.

"For the first time the English reader has a full account set before him of the evidence upon which the chronology of the Assyrian monarchy rests, and of its bearing upon the contemporary chronology of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. . . . For the chronologist and the student of the Bible the volume is more than handy; it is indispensable."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., x. 88.

5. Assyria from the Earliest Times to the Fall of Nineveh, Lon., 1875, 18mo. 6. The Chaldean Account of Genesis: containing the Description of the Creation, the Fall of Man, the Deluge, the Tower of Babel, &c., from the Cuneiform Inscriptions. Illust. and Maps. Lon., 1875, 8vo.

"The present condition of the legends and their recent discovery alike forbid me to call this anything more than a provisional work; but there was so general a desire to see the translations that I have published them, hoping my readers will take them with the same reserve with which I have given them."—Introduction.

"Mr. Smith's Euhemerism will doubtless shock scholars trained in the methods of modern historical and philological enquiry; . . . where Mr. Smith sees actual personages of history, other Assyriologists see only solar heroes or the personifications of natural phenomena."—A. H. SAYCE: Acad., ix. 3.

"In one volume of very moderate dimensions Mr. Smith tells us all that Assyriologists (and himself pre-eminently at the head of such researches) have made out up to this time on the interesting subjects of the Deluge, the Creation and Fall of Man, the (possible) building of the Tower of Babel, and the identification by him of the Biblical Nimrod as a personage he (provisionally) calls Izdubar."—Ath., No. 2512.

A New Edition, Thoroughly Revised and Corrected (with Additions) by A. H. Sayce, Lon., 1881.

"The mosaic work involved in editing a book like George Smith's has been performed with a much greater degree of success than might have been expected. . . . The translations have been brought up to what the accomplished editor regards as our present knowledge of Assyrian."—T. K. CHEYNE: Acad., xix. 164.

"The inadequacy of the present memoir is the more emphatic from the comparative excellence of Mr. Benham's prefatory memoir to the Globe Edition of Cowper's Poems. . . . Mr. Goldwin Smith mentions, as he could hardly fail to do, his acknowledgments to this previous memoir, but he has not found a word of praise for his predecessor. We cannot wonder at his reticence in recommending Mr. Benham's essay, for, having carefully compared them throughout, we find not one page in the later biography which is an improvement on the earlier; and indeed, to all who possess the Globe Edition of Cowper, this new Life by Mr. Goldwin Smith is a mere encumbrance."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 833.

"In his little book on Cowper, Mr. Goldwin Smith is both too brief and too apologetic. . . . It seems to us that Mr. Goldwin Smith has treated Cowper too little as a character, too little as a letter-writer, too little as a man, and too much as a poet."—Spectator, liii. 561.

"The reader will, no doubt, readily detect, alike in substance and rhythm, certain echoes and reminiscences of what is familiar; he will perceive a manifest sympathy with the genius of Tennyson and Browning, showing itself in the general tone and in particular tricks of phrase; but he will become aware also that he is in communication with a richly-endowed mind, sensitive to original impressions, and capable of reproducing them in felicitous and resonant words. Thus the volume is both admirable and disappointing. . . . It has genuine thought, creative imagination, and lyrical sweetness, though sometimes the thought is only surface-deep, the imagination is wanting in vivid completeness, and the reader stumbles over careless and clumsy lines."—Spectator, xlv. 533.

He was elected Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge in 1883, and in 1886 exchanged this position for that of librarian to the university. He was associate editor, and on the death of Prof. J. S. "A work of unique importance in itself, and in relation to the controversies of the time in which we live. . . . For the first time the English reader has in his hands a competent account of the critical method, with some of the most marked results which flow from its application to the literature of the Old Testament. . . . It is a book distinguished by marked ability, by profound learning, by clearness of style and incisiveness of thought."—Spectator, liv. 674.

"Professor Smith selects for his topics the scribes, the Septuagint, the canon, the psalter, the history, the prophets, and the Pentateuch,—a wide range of subjects, which he handles with learning, acuteness, and candor. . . . His general position is that of the most advanced critics. . . . It is the only English book that gives anything like a popular survey of the field, and its vigorous, fresh style, and interesting mode of treatment, make it decidedly readable."—Nation, xxxii. 425.

"The first successful attempt to bring the full power of Semitic philology to bear upon this highly interesting but difficult question was made by Prof. Robertson Smith in a collection of facts about female kinship and totemism which appeared under the title of 'Animal Worship and Animal Tribes among the Arabs and in the Old Testament' in the ninth volume of the 'Journal of Philology.' . . . The honour of finally solving the problem was reserved to the same scholar who had given the first impulse to the study of old Semitic society, and this solution—which future research may modify in secondary points, but will scarcely alter in its chief heads—is contained in the present book. . . . It is a masterpiece of sound reasoning, and no link in the chain of argument betrays the slightest sign of weakness."—Ath., No. 3064.

Spedding, James, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1808–1881, b. at Mirehouse, near Bassenthwaite, Cumberland; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1831, and was afterwards elected an honorary Fellow of that college. At Cambridge he was a contemporary and intimate friend of Alfred Tennyson and Edward Fitzgerald, and he was subsequently well acquainted with Carlyle, Thackeray, and other men of note; but his own life was a very quiet and uneventful one, being almost wholly devoted to study and research in connection with the work by which his name will be permanently remembered. In the preparation of his edition of Bacon's Works he had, as is mentioned ante, vol. ii., the assistance of R. L. Ellis and D. D. Heath; but by far the greater portion of the labor was executed by himself. 1. Companion to the Railway Edition of Lord Campbell's Life of Bacon. By the Railway Reader. Lon., 1853. 2. (Ed.) The Letters and the Life of Francis Bacon, including All his Occasional Works, newly collected and set forth: with a Commentary, Biographical and Historical, Lon., 1857–74, 7 vols. 8vo. (Vols. i.–v. are mentioned ante, vol. ii.)

"The thoroughness, the infinite pains, the ability, with which Mr. Spedding has performed the task to which he may be said to have devoted his life, ought to excite the admiration of all students, and the shame of a good many. But we cannot help wishing that one who knows so much about his subject had found a less cumbrous mode of putting the results of his knowledge before us. A work which probably he could do better than any one else, a fit biography of Bacon, has, after all this, still to be done."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 219.

"It is not merely that his great contribution to English history has no rival for accuracy of judgment, and for industry carried to the extreme point; or that he has taught us to know in his true character one of the greatest statesmen of a land fertile in statesmanship. His book is more than a history, more than a biography. It is a moral school, teaching historical writers to combat the sin which most easily besets them, the tendency to put their own interpretation upon doubtful facts, and their own thoughts into the minds of men of other ages."—SAMUEL R. 6. Evenings with a Reviewer; or, Macaulay and Bacon: with a Prefatory Notice by G. S. Venables, Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo. (This was first printed, for private circulation, in 1848.)

"It is to be regretted that in Mr. Spedding's lifetime this work was only privately printed for the use of a few friends. . . . The matter, and much of the language, were distributed through the several volumes of his 'Letters and Life of Bacon,' where the continuous and cumulative power of the argument is frittered away by the long and frequent breaks between its different parts. In its original shape, which is now made public for the first time, 'Evenings with a Reviewer' is a full and minute examination of Macaulay's essay on Bacon. And never was a showy and hollow display of rhetorical criticism more thoroughly, patiently, and pitilessly dissected by a true critic."—Sat. Rev., liii. 503.

Spencer, Herbert, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1820, at Derby, Eng.; was educated by his father, a teacher in that town, and by his uncle, Rev. Thomas Spencer. He was articled to a civil engineer in 1837, but gave up the profession eight years later, having in the mean time contributed to the Civil Engineer's and Architect's Journal. He then settled in London, where he was sub-editor of the Economist 1848–53, and a contributor to the Westminster Review and Edinburgh Review. Mr. Spencer's publication of evolutionary views antedated that of Darwin's book, and his life has been largely devoted to the development of his System of Synthetic Philosophy, (the programme of which was issued in 1860,) which is an endeavor to carry into the whole region of phenomena the laws of evolution as set forth in his two essays of 1857. In 1882 he paid a visit to the United States. He has been a frequent contributor to leading periodicals, chiefly of articles in defence of his philosophical system against the Duke of Argyll and other assailants. 1. The Principles of Psychology, Lon., 1870–72, 2 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1881. (This is an enlarged edition, with a new arrangement of the matter, of the work with the same title mentioned ante, vol. ii.) 2. The Study of Sociology, Lon., 1873, 8vo; 11th ed., 1885. 3. Essays, Scientific, Political, and Speculative: vol. iii., Lon., 1874, p. 8vo.

"We do not think this volume will be found equal to its predecessors in general importance and interest. The proportion of critical and controversial matter is greater than we should have liked to see; for this is not the kind of writing in which Mr. Spencer excels, and the time and energy spent by him in replying to criticisms appear to us, even when the replies are successful, to be so much lost from the stock available for his principal work. There is no final answer to hostile criticism of a great work but the permanence of the work itself. However, Mr. Spencer has given us good specimens of his constructive genius in the essays on Animal Worship and on Laws in General."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 20.

4. Descriptive Sociology; or, Groups of Sociological Facts; compiled and abstracted by James Collier, Professor D. Duncan, of Madras, and Dr. Richard Sheppig, Lon., 1874–82, 8 numbers, fol. No. 1, English; No. 2, Ancient American Races; No. 3, Lowest Races, Negritto Races, Polynesians; No. 4, African Races; No. 5, Asiatic Races; No. 6, American Races; No. 7, Hebrews and Phœnicians; No. 8, The French Civilization. (This work was compiled under Mr. Spencer's direction, and furnished him with facts and illustrations in support of his views. For a correspondence in regard to its character and value, in which Mr. Spencer, Mr. Collier, and Mr. S. R. Gardiner took part, see Acad., v. 92–94, 145–146.)

"This work is designed to be a gigantic book of reference, and to a great extent what may be called a book of reference of the second order, inasmuch as many of the authorities compiled from are themselves books of reference; for which reason a judicious reader who would use it with safety and profit must bring to it even more than the ordinary caution required in consulting such works." —Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 185.

5. The Principles of Sociology: vol. i., Lon., 1877, 8vo: 3d ed., 1885.

"The ground covered by Mr. Spencer's undertaking is large and varied; in part it is unoccupied, or nearly so. But the most striking chapters in this volume, though perhaps not the most important in the general plan, are those where Mr. Spencer's work comes into contact, sometimes into collision, with that of other inquirers, who have gone before him in special departments of the history of culture and beliefs. The book contains indeed a series of challenges, some more explicit than others, but all sufficiently definite, which we may expect to see taken up in due course by those whom they principally concern."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 170.

6. Ceremonial Institutions: being Part IV. of the Principles of Sociology, (vol. ii., Part I.,) Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"The leading idea which Mr. Spencer develops and illustrates all through the book is that in the early history of society and institutions form has gone before substance. . . . Mr. Spencer has already shown a tendency to underrate the complexity of social phenomena, and to jump at solutions which on the face of them are much too easy to be true. . . . In general, Mr. Spencer's authorities, both old and new, are too much counted and too little weighed. . . . The defects are perhaps inseparable from the method and conditions of his work; and, after all is said, he has collected a great mass of scattered facts and made them significant in the light of general ideas as no other living man could have done it."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 21.

"Though from the nature of its subject-matter it cannot be considered as one of Mr. Spencer's most valuable works, there are perhaps few of them more startling in the unexpected order so admirably introduced into a mass of chaotic material."—GRANT ALLEN: Acad., xvii. 58.

7. The Data of Ethics: being the First Portion of the Principles of Ethics, Lon., 1879, 8vo; 4th ed., 1884.

"It shows Mr. Spencer's constructive power at its best, and takes rank in the highest order of philosophical writings, those which give us not only arguments but ideas."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 447.

"The question about action is the most urgent of all, and it is therefore matter of rejoicing that such an incarnation, such a perfect saw-mill, we were going to say, of evolutionism as Mr. Spencer should have seen fit to publish his Ethics in advance of their proper place in the work to which he has devoted his life. . . . His work contains masses of strikingly-expressed criticism and illustration of the incoherence of our actual ethical standards. It is certain to form a powerful centre of crystallization for the fluid thought of recent days, and is, it seems to us after this first perusal, decidedly the most noteworthy production of its energetic author."—Nation, xxix. 178.

"The effect of the book on the mature student of philosophy will be to convey to him much that is suggestive and delightful, in its laborious and subtle analysis, and its display, so congenial to all really thoughtful minds, of the passion for an all-comprehending generalization, whether he is led to concur with the author's views or not. At all events, it cannot fail to interest him as an earnest, and what we cannot avoid calling a desperate, effort to drag the noblest phenomena of our nature into the evolution theory."—Spectator, liii. 240.

"This volume contains . . . Mr. Spencer's attempt to place morality on a deductive and final basis. We have in it most of the data from which in his opinion future deductions are to be made; and we may say that, thanks to his power of selecting from among the first principles which are 'in the air' those which are most scientific and probable, thanks also to his high powers of analysis and co-ordination, he has produced a treatise on morals which may be regarded as more truly representative of the gains of modern thought than any that has yet appeared. At the same time, taking this volume by itself, we must bear in mind that the principles he lays down in it are meant for ideal men in an ideal society; they are not meant to be translated immediately into practice; they are analytical rather than historical or actual; and any attempt of the kind we have mentioned would be anticipating the course of evolution, and would be dangerous rather than beneficial in its effects."—Ath., No. 2705.

8. Political Institutions: being Part V. of the Principles of Sociology, (vol. ii, Part II.,) Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"His generalizations, founded mostly on extracts compiled for him in the folios of 'Descriptive Sociology,' are often of inferior quality, partly from the extracts themselves being scraps, and partly from his own method of inference being uncritical."—E. B. TYLOR: Acad., xxiii. 53.

9. The Man versus the State, Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"According to Mr. Herbert Spencer, the true Liberal doctrine is 'greater freedom from restraint, particularly in political institutions.' . . . Mr. Spencer would restrict the functions of the State to those of the police magistrate and policeman."—Spectator, lviii. 421.

"As an analysis of a temporary tendency, Mr. Herbert Spencer's book is very interesting; but we are far from thinking it a complete or adequate treatment of the subject."—Nation, xli. 39.

10. Ecclesiastical Institutions: being Part VI. of the Principles of Sociology, (vol. ii., Part III.,) Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"He always writes didactically: he expounds his opinion on some subject and then proceeds to illustrate it by facts drawn from any race or age; for such purposes of illustration one traveller's tale answers as well as another. But when these illustrations have served to make clear what Mr. Spencer's opinion is, the reader is still at a loss to understand how it is proved."—Ath., No. 3045.

11. The Factors of Organic Evolution: reprinted from the "Nineteenth Century," Lon., 1887, 8vo.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Possessing as he does an acquaintance with almost all branches of physical science, together with a singular quickness in the detection of analogies, and much analytic power, he has the good fortune to be also able to manifest his wealth of thought by a corresponding richness of diction, his style being clear and forcible, abounding in picturesque illustrations, aptly chosen for the purposes they are intended to subserve, and often possessing even a poetical beauty. Vigorous and well-exercised natural faculties have enabled him to gather up within his delicate yet nervous grasp, not only the multitudinous threads spun by the various discoverers in physical science, but also those yet more subtle fibres which our recent best known psychologists have drawn forth; weaving the whole, with dexterous skill, into an intellectual fabric of great delicacy and apparent cohesion. Mr. Spencer has indeed so coordinated, supplemented, and developed the doctrines of his contemporaries and immediate predecessors that the philosophy he sets before us is the very culmination of their efforts,—the bloom and fructification resulting from long-continued anterior processes of growth. . . . It is the presence of the positive elements in Mr. Spencer's philosophy which makes us hopeful as to some of its results in one direction, while deploring its fatal effects generally. . . . His system is not a final resting-place, but a halting-station in the philosopher's progress, and one at which several roads meet and diverge. Spencerism, like Lockism, may form a landmark in the history of philosophy."—Quarterly Rev., cxxxv. 509.

"Mr. Spencer's conception of philosophy is of that large and ambitious character which we have hitherto associated exclusively with the names of Continental, and especially of German, thinkers. In his view science rests upon certain ultimate necessities of thought or a priori principles, and the first principles of the special sciences are likewise a priori; and it is the business of philosophy to unify knowledge by exhibiting it as a deduction from, or synthesis of, these first principles. The province of each special science is of necessity limited; it deals with the universe in one or other of its many aspects or relations, and accordingly it can never tell us what the universe itself is, but only how it appears from one point of view. When, therefore, scientific achievement has been carried to its farthest limit there will still remain the further question—What, after all, is the universe itself? To some minds this question at present seems, and doubtless will long continue to seem, hopeless of solution. It is, however, this question, and no other, to which the 'Synthetic Philosophy' is intended by its author to furnish the final answer. . . . He claims to have established his ontological doctrine upon a scientific basis, upon the basis of the idea of evolution applied as an universal method to the interpretation of the phenomena of the universe; to have introduced into astronomy on the one hand, and psychology and its dependent sciences on the other, the same method which Darwin applied exclusively to biology; and by so doing to have accomplished that unification of knowledge which, as we have seen, in his view constitutes philosophy. . . . Mr. Spencer's philosophy can hardly be long-lived. . . . The inevitable verdict of posterity will ratify our own in pronouncing his 'unification of knowledge' a clumsy piece of legerdemain."—London Quarterly Rev., lx. 336.

"In spite of the internecine warfare between his principles and the theological and metaphysical principles officially admitted, even antagonists are compelled to admit the force and clearness of his genius, the extent and profundity of his scientific knowledge. It is questionable whether any thinker of finer calibre has appeared in our country, although the future alone can determine the position he is to assume in History. At present he is too close to us for an accurate estimate. . . . He alone of British thinkers has organized a System of Philosophy."—G. H. LEWES: The History of Philosophy, 4th ed., ii. 756.

"No philosopher achieves such vast popularity as Spencer except by reason of some real merit. Mr. Spencer's principal merit is his pluck in trying to do what every philosophy must do,—to formulate the phenomenal universe in a simple, positive, dogmatic way. His next merit is that he is profuse of facts familiar as well as remote, and untechnical in his manner of exposition. When another author shall arise who, standing as little aloof from the plane of the popular intelligence as Mr. Spencer, shall make a synthesis as truly complete as his is spuriously so, as distinct in its formulation as his is equivocal, as consistent as his is incoherent, that author will easily drive Mr. Spencer from his stronghold in the popular imagination."—Nation, xxx. 392.

Spurgeon, Rev. Charles Haddon, [ante, vol. ii., add.] The popularity of Mr. Spurgeon as a preacher has suffered no diminution, though his health in recent years has been somewhat impaired. The annual publication of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, containing the reports of his sermons, has gone on without interruption, reaching its thirty-third volume in 1888, with a circulation of 25,000 or more. Besides a Pastors' College, schools, almshouses, and an orphanage have been founded in connection with the tabernacle, endowed in part with the proceeds of two testimonials, amounting to about £12,000, which were presented to Mr. Spurgeon on the occasion of his "silver wedding," in 1879, and of his fiftieth birthday, in 1884. "No one perhaps has so clearly brought out as Dean Stanley the peculiar antagonism, the spirit of protest and of independent action, that has pervaded all vital expressions of religious influence in Scotland."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 841.

"The Dean has given us exquisite sketches of the Celtic and Church period, most finished dramatic episodes of Covenanting story, has preached most eloquent lessons on charity, especially in the sermon, prefixed to the lectures, which was delivered in the time-honoured church of Old Greyfriars, in Edinburgh, on the 'Eleventh Commandment,' 'That ye love one another.' But as it seems to us, and as it has seemed to some of his greatest admirers in the North, he has simply postponed indefinitely the great moral result which might have flowed from his lectures by his ignoring, first of all, the intense belief of the Scotch people in their ecclesiastical independence; and, secondly, by his glorification of a questionable generation—the world-famous 'Moderates'—as representatives in their day of the deepest worth of Scotch churchmen."—Spectator, xlv. 694.

"It will introduce many to a better knowledge of Judaism, and prompt them to study it. Dr. Stanley has shown his ability to transfuse life into the past of Israel. If he stands in a middle path between advanced scholars and general readers, and glosses over things unpleasant to the average English mind; if he weaves the historical and legendary together into a web of pleasing texture, without a hint of separation, he cannot be blamed for standing where he may be more useful than the fearless inquirer who speaks out, with blunt honesty, what he thinks about the sacred records, and suffers accordingly."—Ath., No. 2550.

"If a graceful and picturesque style were alone sufficient to make a good historian, the Dean of Westminster would have few rivals. But the business of the historian is, after all, to write history; and Dean Stanley's last volume, judged by that test, must be pronounced a failure. Most of it, indeed, is nothing more than Ewald done into beautiful English."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 51.

"To us it seems that since the year in which the Rev. A. P. Stanley made the name of Thomas Arnold a household word in every province and town in which the English language is spoken,—if not, indeed, throughout the civilized world,—there have not appeared many memoirs which exceed the present volume, take it for all in all, in moral value or personal interest. . . . But we would gladly have learned a good deal more concerning both the Bishop and his wife, especially the latter."—Spectator, liii. 147.

15. Christian Institutions: Essays on Ecclesiastical Subjects, Lon., 1881, 8vo; 4th ed., 1884.

"It is quite impossible, within the limits of a single article, to do anything like justice to a volume like the present, which covers almost the entire field of Christian doctrine and of Christian ritual, which is so thickly studded with facts, and which contains such eloquent expositions of the deeper and more spiritual meanings of the Apostles' Creed and of the Ten Commandments."—Spectator, liv. 933.

Stanley, Henry Morton, whose name was originally John Rowlands, b. 1840, near Denbigh, Wales, at the age of fifteen sailed as a cabin-boy to New Orleans, where he was adopted by a merchant named Stanley. He enlisted in the Confederate army in the civil war, was taken prisoner, and afterwards joined the Federal service. In 1867 he went with the British army to Abyssinia as correspondent of the New York Herald. In 1870 he was sent by the same paper to Africa in search of Livingstone, whom he found in November, 1871, at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika. In 1874 he was again sent to Africa by the New York Herald and the London Daily Telegraph, made an exploration of Lakes Albert and Victoria Nyanza, and returned in 1878. In 1879 he undertook an expedition, fitted out by the King of the Belgians, on behalf of the African International Association, which resulted in the establishment of trading-stations along the Congo, and the establishment, in 1884, of the Congo Free State. In 1887 he set out on an expedition organized for the relief of Emin Pasha, and, having accomplished this purpose, returned to Europe in 1890, and was received with extraordinary demonstrations of welcome and applause in Italy, Belgium, and England. As a discoverer Stanley is considered to rank after Livingstone, but he has traversed a larger portion of the African Continent than any former explorer, and contributed in a greater degree to the diffusion of information in regard to the interior and the furtherance of projects for the extension of commerce and civilization. 1. How I Found Livingstone: Travels and Adventures in Central Africa: including an Account of Four Months' Residence with Dr. Livingstone. Map and Illust. Lon. and N. York, 1872, 8vo; new ed., 1874.

"In spite of all its defects, it is incomparably more lively than most books of African travel. . . . The narrative naturally falls into three parts. First, there is Mr. Stanley's journey from the coast to the charming town of Unyanyembe; . . . secondly, there are adventures which befell Mr. Stanley in forcing his way past hostile tribes from Unyanyembe to Ujiji; and thirdly, there is the residence with Dr. Livingstone, and the return to the coast. . . . The American people have a reputation for turning their hands to anything with strange versatility and success, and certainly Mr. Stanley seems in this respect to be an excellent specimen of the race."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 635.

"Mr. Stanley's book unquestionably takes rank with those of Burton, Grant, Speke, and all other travellers in the same district of Africa, in so far as it is a truthful and trustworthy account of what he saw, heard, and did. In scientific attainments he was inferior to all his predecessors, in descriptive power as well, though his narrative is anything but dry reading, and contains many excellent descriptions of scenery."—Nation, xvi. 118.

2. My Kalulu, Prince, King, and Slave: a Story of Central Africa, Lon. and N. York, 1873, p. 8vo.

"The lack of literary skill . . . is in a measure atoned for by the evident genuineness of the whole performance."—Nation, xviii. 96.

3. Coomassie and Magdala: the Story of Two British Campaigns in Africa, Lon., 1874, 8vo. 4. Through the Dark Continent; or, The Sources of the Nile: around the Great Lakes of Equatorial Africa: and down the Livingstone River to the Atlantic Ocean. Maps and Illust. Lon. and N. York, 1878, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Stanley's work is a substantial addition to our geographical literature upon Africa, not only because it deals with vast regions which have hitherto been a blank upon our maps, but also because it supplies exact and trustworthy information with respect to them."—Ath., No. 2643.

"It is impossible not to regard him as one of the extraordinary men of our time. . . . We are impressed here, as in his 'How I Found Livingstone,' with his humane regard for inferior beings, and with his uniform attempt to deal with them as if they recognized the same standards and were actuated by the same motives with himself."—Nation, xxvii. 179.

5. The Congo and the Founding of its Free State: a Story of Work and Exploration. Maps and Illust. Lon. and N. York, 1885, 2 vols. 8vo.

"In some respects the book is disappointing. The Congo is not an interesting river. The people who live on its banks are savages, pure and simple, with little individuality. It requires, therefore, more literary skill than the author possesses to make his record of the work of dragging wagons, of tedious negotiations, of founding stations, and exploring rivers with low, monotonous banks and water as black as ink, entertaining to the general reader."—Nation, xli. 260.

"It is not only one of the chief works of the year, but is likely to remain a standard authority on Africa for at least a generation to come."—Sat. Rev., lx. 25.

"Mr. Stanley may fairly boast of having given to the world two of the most remarkable books of travel and adventure. . . . And this second work is in every respect by far the more interesting,—the more creditable to its author, if it be permissible to use such an expression. Whilst the geographer cannot afford to neglect it, it appeals to wider sympathies. It will be read with avidity by that large and ever-increasing number of persons who look upon the regeneration of Africa as a thing not only desirable, but also possible; it appeals to the merchants and manufacturers to whom Africa, abounding in natural wealth and teeming with people, is a promising field for their enterprise."—Ath., No. 3004.

"Mr. Statham was once minister of a Scotch congregation who had originally gathered round an ex-Congregational minister for whom Mr. Huxley delivered one of the best of his well-known lay sermons. . . . This was, no doubt, a very instructive experience; and it has led the author, who apparently learnt to think from Mr. Spencer and to write from Mr. Arnold, to some very curious and not unimportant conclusions. The chief of them is that the hope of England is to be found in a combination of Erastianism and Ritualism, to be worked by a learned clergy, who are to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, to be promoted by seniority in the country parishes, by merit in towns, and are to act as professors of daily conduct. . . . It is in the negative part of his book that Mr. Statham himself succeeds best. The chapter on 'The Danger of Free Thought' is really quite unanswerable."—G. A. SIMCOX: Acad., xxvi. 88.

Stedman, Edmund Clarence, M.A., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1833, at Hartford, Conn.; matriculated at Yale College 1849, but did not graduate; became a journalist, and was war correspondent of the New York World 1861–63; has been for many years engaged in business as stock-broker in New York, while devoting much time to literature, chiefly in the departments of poetry and criticism. 1. Complete Poetical Works, Bost., 1874, cr. 8vo. (There is also a "Household Edition," 1884.)

"They all have their excellences. But those that come nearest to having, or do have, the wholeness and roundness which satisfy the natural desire for perfection . . . are not those poems in the volume which are most ambitious."—Nation, xviii. 141.

2. Victorian Poets, Bost., 1875, 12mo; 13th ed., with a supplementary chapter, 1887.

"As a hand-book to the poetic literature of England during the last and present generations, Mr. Stedman's volume is commendable and serviceable. . . . As a 'philosophical critic,' Mr. Stedman shows himself more receptive and impressible than discriminating; he exhibits facility rather than force of mind, and more fluency of expression than body of thought or keenness of discernment."—Nation, xxii. 117.

"He may not have the large wisdom, or the keen insight and delicate touch, which accompany literary judgment of the highest kind, and make even criticism almost creative, and which are seldom found apart from considerable powers of original production. But he is faithful, studious, and discerning; of a sane and reasonable temper, and in the main a judicial one; his judgment is disciplined and exercised, and his decisions, even when one cannot agree with them, are based on intelligible grounds."—Sat. Rev., xl. 747.

"The whole volume will be found judicious and sympathetic. Mr. Stedman has treated a subject of great interest in a manner which is as attractive to the reader as it is just to the poets whom he has undertaken to criticise."—Spectator, xlix. 275.

"Mr. Stedman is not always the most subtle or discriminating of critics, but there is none among ourselves who equals him in breadth of sympathy, or in ability to resist allurement by the will-o'-the-wisp of mere form."—WILLIAM SHARP: Acad., xxxiii. 127.

"The book is so thorough, so penetrating, and so judicial in its temper, that to the poetical student it is quite indispensable."—Ath., No. 3141.

5. Lyrics and Idylls, with other Poems, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo. (This is a selection, made by the author, of seventy poems from volumes previously published in America.)

"The most distinguished poet born in the United States since 1820. . . . He is essentially a lyrist, and a lyrist . . . of a high order. . . . His poetry is fresh and buoyant, full of memories of great deeds and joyous experiences, and seems to contain the elements of a lasting popularity."—E. W. GOSSE: Acad., xvi. 403.

6. Edgar Allan Poe, Bost., 1880, 16mo.

"Mr. Stedman's essay is pure criticism, and is, like all his work in that direction, of very high character. There is sometimes a little prolixity and perhaps over-refining; a touch of judicial self-consciousness; . . . yet these are but a small abatement of the praise due for such admirable work."—Nation, xxxi. 360.

7. Poets of America, Bost., 1885, 12mo; large-paper ed., limited to 150 copies, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Stedman is at his best in special criticisms and obiter dicta, while in all that involves broad generalization the reader is apt to feel a want of breadth and volume of thought."—Nation, xli. 490.

"Those who are occasionally ruffled by Mr. Stedman's style will be the first to admit that he has a genuine faculty as a critic, that he is highly accomplished, that he has read deeply as well as widely, and that his insight is often very penetrating."—Sat. Rev., lxvii. 81.

"All books of popular tales are not good presents to give to children, and all fairy-tales that amuse children are not good studies for the 'folk-lorist.' 'Wide Awake Stories,' which Messrs. [sic] Steel and Temple have collected from the mouths of the peasantry in the Punjaub, are good for both audiences,—good for the school-room and good for the study."—Ath., No. 3017.

(The author argues in favor of secular associations of nurses as against sisterhoods formed on a theological basis.)

"We recommend Miss Stephen's book to all who are thinking of entering sisterhoods, and still more to all who are engaged in the conduct of them. They will find in it much that deserves consideration, much from which, if they honestly apply it, they cannot fail to derive profit. But we cannot agree with the conclusion to which she wishes to lead the general public, and we are sure that she would find the end she has at heart injured by any general adoption of her advice."—*Sat. "If Mr. Stephen were a professed defender of established institutions, his criticisms of liberty, equality, and fraternity might perhaps be equally forcible, but they would be much less novel. . . . He avows himself a utilitarian and a disciple of Locke, of Bentham, and to a certain extent of Mr. Mill."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 517.

"It is a history of the English criminal law, and a very good history, well told, well proportioned, lively, yet discreet and dignified. But it is also very much more. It is full of piquant dissertations on matters of current interest. . . . We find a sketch of the criminal law of Rome, an elaborate comparison of the merits of the English and French methods of criminal procedure, a subtle disquisition on insanity, and a collection of typical English and French trials. . . . Delightful and instructive from one end to the other."—Sat. Rev., lv. 310.

"In these two middle-sized volumes . . . the author has torn to shreds the whole tissue of slander and misrepresentation which enabled the great Whig essayist to consign—for a time, at least—to popular infamy the fair fame of a judge as upright and well-meaning as ever, perhaps, sat upon the Calcutta bench."—Ath., No. 3011.

Stephen, Mrs. Julia Prinsep, (Duckworth,) married to Leslie Stephen, infra. Notes from Sick-Rooms, Lon., 1883, 12mo.

Stephen, Leslie, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1832, at Kensington, London; son of the late Sir James Stephen, (q. v., ante, vol. ii.,) and brother of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, supra; was educated at Eton, at King's College, London, and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, of which he was for some years Fellow and tutor. He was editor of the Cornhill Magazine 1871–82, and resigned that post in order to become editor of the Dictionary of National Biography. In 1883 he became lecturer on English literature at Cambridge, but he held that office for only one year. He married Harriet Marion, younger daughter of W. M. Thackeray, who died in 1875. Mr. Stephen has contributed to the Saturday Review and other periodicals. 1. The Play-Ground of Europe. Illust. Lon., 1871, p. 8vo. (Consists of articles describing Alpine ascents and adventures.)

"The spirit of the play-ground is just that in which the book before us is written. There is all its vigour and animal spirits, its plentiful fun, and its full measure of earnestness about the play itself."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 443.

2. Essays on Freethinking and Plainspeaking, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"The contents of the present volume are reproductions, with more or less modification, of articles which have appeared in 'Fraser's Magazine' and the 'Fortnightly Review.' . . . It is perhaps satisfactory to meet with them, not in single file, but massed together as united representatives of the new 'faith' which has found a patron and defender in Mr. Leslie Stephen."—Spectator, xlvii. 920.

3. Hours in a Library, Lon., 1874–79, 3 vols. 8vo. (Reprinted from the Cornhill Magazine and other periodicals.)

"Good taste, sound judgment, competent knowledge, and an occasional vivacity of expression,—these literary virtues are evident throughout. . . . On the other hand, we do not find in this work the subtle criticism, the fine imagination, or the perfect beauty of utterance, which so attract us in some volumes of biographical and literary criticism that we are drawn towards them again and again." —Spectator, xlvii. 857.

"A more thoughtful and conscientious collection of literary criticisms has not appeared for many years."—Ath., No. 2686.

4. History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, Lon., 1876, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1881.

"The book, with all its merits, is . . . only a series of contributions to the subject indicated on its title-page."—Ath., No. 2561.

"His point of view is that of a playfully truculent agnostic, who has had the great advantage, for the purpose of this controversy, of having been trained (as the reader will infer) in a school of cultivated religious belief. . . . The lack of warmth, which makes Mr. Stephen less than satisfactory as a critic in his longer studies, makes itself still more felt in his rapid sketches of writers in groups. But we know of no book of the kind which contains so much information or so much keen and lively criticism of the same order."—Spectator, liv. 573.

5. Samuel Johnson, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"He has written a book which will be the more interesting the better the reader is acquainted with the subject. In fact, he has, perhaps without being fully conscious of it, written rather for those who know Boswell than for those who wish to be saved the trouble of knowing him."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 828.

6. Alexander Pope, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1880, p. 8vo.

"We are not sure whether it is altogether the fault of the subject that his treatment of it is unlikely to take away the unsatisfied feeling left by previous biographers." —Sat. Rev., l. 59.

7. The Science of Ethics, Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"Mr. Stephen leaves metaphysics in the strict sense almost entirely on one side, and endeavours to show by example that a rational and fairly sufficient ethical doctrine may be formed without prejudice to ultimate philosophical questions, without reliance on any particular solution of them, and indeed without deciding whether they are soluble or not. Our opinion is that he has succeeded."—Sat. Rev., liv. 344, 413.

8. Swift, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Leslie Stephen is not exactly the writer whom a lover of Swift would choose for the purpose. His acquaintance with the period is indeed unquestionable: and his general faculty of literary appreciation is of a high order. But it is not so unquestionable whether Mr. Stephen is highly qualified to appreciate humour, especially humour of so exceptional a kind as Swift's. . . . As a biographic sketch the book deserves hardly anything but praise."—Sat. Rev., liv. 443.

9. (Ed.) The Works of Henry Fielding: with a Biographical Essay. Illust. Lon., 1882, 10 vols. r. 8vo.

"The editing of the new Fielding is by no means so scholarly as was to be desired. The arrangement is entirely arbitrary; the text, save that in 'Amelia' a few suppressed passages have been reprinted, appears to be mainly that of Arthur Murphy; of annotations and explanations, which are absolutely indispensable to a correct and complete understanding of Fielding, and which, judiciously supplied, would have gone far to make the edition final, there is not one in all the ten volumes. . . . Of Mr. Stephen's introductory essay we can speak in terms of almost unqualified approval. . . . It may, without exaggeration, be described as the best and soundest estimate of Fielding that has yet appeared."—Ath., No. 2871.

10. Life of Henry Fawcett: with Two Portraits, Lon., 1885, cr. 8vo.

"It is a very incomplete 'life' in the sense of a biography or memoir. . . . It is rather a series of essays than of personal memoirs. . . . Mr. Stephen's interesting volume leaves room for yet another, which should be equal to it in value, showing how, in the more private relations of his life, Fawcett maintained the same high qualities which adorned his public career."—Ath., No. 3031.

11. (Ed.) The Dictionary of National Biography: vols. i.–xxv., Lon., 1885–91, 8vo.

"The ideal dictionary of English biography would have been one written as well as edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen. In every volume of this work . . . he evinces his decisive superiority among English biographers. All the essential facts are to be found accurately set forth in his articles; his criticisms, both of work and character, are just, and, at the same time, merciful; his style never loses its interest and individuality, even when facts are most crowded; and his irrepressible humour oozes up through the dry sands of bibliography. The ideal being unattainable, we acknowledge with gratitude that as near an approach to it as was possible has been made. There are great inequalities in the articles; the treatment of one or two subjects is throughout not strong, if it cannot be called positively weak; but by far the larger part is adequate; and we see more and more clearly as the work goes on the controlling hand of the editor in the suppression of all that is tawdry, affected, and pretentious. The work, it may be said at once, more than justifies the highest expectations that have been formed of it, and is a permanent and noble contribution to the literature of England."—W. Robertson Nicoll: Acad., xxx. 65.

"The editor and his staff have maintained a remarkable evenness of execution and justness of proportion, and above all a spirit of simple truthfulness which becomes the more impressive the more one makes himself acquainted with the contents. Doubtless we owe a great deal of this excellence to Mr. Stephen himself, in whom these literary and moral qualities are conspicuous, and whose articles (collectively the best in the Dictionary) are models for all his colaborers."—Nation, xlvi. 328.

"The thoroughness of the work is such that the Dictionary has become an indispensable book of reference, and when it is completed its influence will be strongly felt on the scholarship of the next generation. . . . It is not a series of suggestive monographs, but a mass of trustworthy information, drawn from original sources, which the student needs and which Mr. Stephen has endeavoured to supply." —English Historical Review, v. 783.

"While recognizing the worth of what has been done by other writers on the period at large, he has entered on the same field as an independent worker, and has given us the results of an independent and laborious examination of a mass of special and original authorities. . . . Admirable as the industry is that Mr. Stephens displays in this volume, one is tempted to wish that he had read less and spent more time in trying to picture to himself and his readers the events with which he deals, for his work seems as if it had had all life crushed out of it by the multitude of books he has consulted. . . . His book, when complete, will be an important addition to the history of the Revolution, and one that no student of the period may safely neglect or will be inclined to undervalue."—*Sat. Scholarly, well conceived, unflagging in interest, and perfect in execution, it has not, however, caught the popular ear; as was perhaps to be expected. . . . The poem is full of life and colour, and that vivid presentment which marks the possession of no ordinary share of the divine afflatus, and alone suffices to carry the reader through a work of such length."—Contemporary Rev., lii. 412.

It is not too much to say that Mr. Stephens has added a permanent contribution to English ecclesiastical biography. . . . His work is by no means free from literary flaws, and we can conceive that it might have turned out a heavy and dull performance but for the assistance which he has received from Dean Hook's lifelong friend, Lord Hatherley, not only through the long and interesting chapter of early reminiscences contributed by the latter, but still more by the rich mass of autobiographical memorials which he has supplied in the shape of Hook's letters to himself."—*Sat. "The volume before us has a special claim to attention, as giving what to all intents and purposes must be considered as Mary's own account of herself during that period of her life in which her actions are most canvassed. . . . This remarkable fragment has existed for nearly three centuries in what was almost all along the best known and the most accessible collection of MSS. in the whole kingdom, namely, the Cottonian Library, and no one till within the last few years took the trouble to decipher it and tell the world what was in it."—Ath., No. 2895.

"The writer was apparently provoked to his task by the vagaries of the Wyclif quincentenary celebration committee. They may accept the work as an indication of the harm done by approaching a purely historic matter in a spirit of partisanship, since Father Stevenson has emulated them. It is unfortunate that a work displaying real research and much ability should have been undertaken in such a spirit."—J. P. WHITNEY: Historical Review, No. 7.

Stevenson, Robert Louis Balfour, b. 1850, in Edinburgh, Scotland; son of Thomas Stevenson, civil engineer, supra, and grandson of Robert Stevenson, (q. v., ante, vol. ii.;) was educated at private schools and at Edinburgh University, and intended for the engineering profession, his ancestors having been for three generations engineers to the Board of Northern Lights. He gave up that profession, studied law, and was called to the Scottish bar, but never practised, and, his health having failed, he devoted himself to literature and to travelling. He has twice visited the United States, having once made the journey to San Francisco as an emigrant, and later spent a winter in the Adirondacks and has recently spent some time in Samoa. 1. An Inland Voyage, Lon., 1878, cr. 8vo.

"The 'Inland Voyage' seems to be a compound of the styles of Sir Philip Sidney and Bacon, George Herbert, Sterne, and Mr. Blackmore's rural characters of the last century. . . . Looking at English composition from his very peculiar point of view, nothing can be more creditable than the extreme trouble he takes to go out of his way to pick circumlocutory phrases when there are short and simple words that would apparently answer his purpose. . . . We admit that he often amuses us with a clever thing; and not unfrequently we come on a novel idea among a crowd of platitudes rather prettily expressed. . . . Now and then, when he appears to forget himself, he has flashes of unaffected liveliness; he dashes off telling little sketches of character, and has graceful touches of vivid landscape-painting."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 701.

"Two friends start in two canoes, the 'Cigarette' and the 'Arethusa,' for a voyage on some Belgian and French rivers. . . . The narrative will delight any reader who can enter sufficiently into the author's mood to enjoy the half-humorous, half-pathetic moralizings which give a charm to these pages. . . . Mr. Stevenson does not look at nature with the eye of a poet, but he does see nature with his own eyes, instead of through the spectacles of books, and he can describe in felicitous language what he sees and what he feels."—Spectator, li. 926.

"It contains passages of feeling, humour, insight, description, expressed with fluency and finish in the best manner of English prose. . . . Paradoxical, . . . yet from time to time striking out a flash both new and true,—humorously or cordially rebellious, but never sour or puling,—material, even animal, in his philosophy, but anon full of fancies the most chivalrous or tender,—this brilliant and entertaining writer may at one moment show himself too raw in youth, and at another his words may seem to carry in them an echo of Heine, or at another of Sterne; but we shall acknowledge that he has both gifts and promise, and one inestimable gift in especial,—charm."—Ath., No. 2640.

"I wonder how many people there are in England who know that Robert Louis Stevenson is, in his own way, (and he is wise enough to write simply in his own way,) one of the most perfect writers living, one of the very few who may yet do something that will become classical?"—P. G. HAMERTON: Acad., xiii. 547.

2. Edinburgh: Picturesque Notes: with Etchings by A. Brunet-Debaines, Vignettes, &c., Lon., 1878, fol.; new ed., 1888, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Stevenson can see Edinburgh as she is; he seems to have suffered from the adorers of Burns, and even appears to take a mischievous pleasure in telling his countrymen the result of a dispassionate inspection of their capital. . . . Our quotations . . . make it needless to say anything about his style. It speaks for itself; it is captivating and irritating; it keeps the attention awake; it sketches a picture; in two words, it is never commonplace; it retains an accent of the quaintness of a time of leisure."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 120.

3. Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1883.

"It would be doing Mr. Stevenson a great injustice to pretend that he sets the bare facts of this journey before us as of any value. . . . The merit of his tale is in the telling, and we must read the book slowly, for it is on account of its style that it merits our attention. . . . His writing is as elegant as ever, but it is more natural, and the phrases of humour and the parentheses of fine reflection no longer seem put in with any art; they have grown with the growth of the narrative. There is the same strong sympathy with humanity, the same power to read the 'red-leaved and confused book of the heart,' the same happy flight of quaint and original fun; but there is less egotism, and the view of natural life is sweeter and healthier. It is remarkable that on so slight a thread so many jewels of thought and fancy can be hung; for the thread, we must confess, is exceedingly slight."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 776.

4. Virginibus Puerisque, and other Papers, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

"There is no paper in this little collection but is sure of its readers, none that can fail to give a novel and exciting pleasure when the right man or woman opens the book in the right mood and the right hour."—Sat. Rev., li. 528.

"Regarding . . . these essays as elaborate studies in the literary art, . . . one cannot be deaf to the praises which his refined and flexible style has so fully deserved, and which may here be endorsed without repetition. The many instances of strained metaphor, forced illustration, and obscure extravagance which we might quote are due not to defects of style, but to barrenness of matter."—Acad., xx. 21.

5. Familiar Studies of Men and Books, Lon., 1882, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Stevenson is not seen at his best in this volume. Of course his 'studies' are elegantly written and pleasant to read; but criticism is hardly his forte. The turn of his mind is distinctly subjective; and he is certainly happier when he is telling his readers how the immediate objects of sense affect him than when he is trying to estimate other people who have in their own way done the same."—Ath., No. 2840.

"All the essays will repay careful perusal, because, apart from fresh facts or novel suggestions, they often act upon us aggressively, exciting to independent thought."—Sat. Rev., liii. 508.

6. New Arabian Nights, Lon., 1882, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"There is little but pleasure to be got out of the 'New Arabian Nights,' with their striking fertility of invention, their charming touch of a chivalry which is by no means too common either in real life or in fiction, and that other quality of the author's, also by no means too common, of making his readers sup full of horrors and yet putting no offence in it."—Sat. Rev., liv. 250.

"As a collection of grotesque romances, the 'New Arabian Nights' are perfect in form and finish; and such an aim is not only legitimate in itself, but constitutes a fresh departure in romance-writing."—Spectator, lv. 1450.

7. Treasure Island, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1884.

"It is a book for boys which will be delightful to all grown men who have the sentiment of treasure-hunting and are touched with the true spirit of the Spanish Main. . . . It is written—in that crisp, choice, nervous English of which he has the secret—with such a union of measure and force as to be in its way a masterpiece of narrative."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 737.

8. The Silverado Squatters: a Sketch from a California Mountain, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo; new ed., 1884.

"It is not the best of Mr. Stevenson's works; but only Mr. Stevenson would have written it."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 520.

9. A Child's Garden of Verse, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"Never before has the inner life of childhood been so apprehended or portrayed by an English writer."—Ath., No. 3001.

"Some of its lyrics would undoubtedly delight any child old enough to delight in such things at all; while others, again, will undoubtedly be read with pleasure by its elders. What we look for, however, in a book of this sort, though perhaps it is putting our requirements too high, is the combination of the same kind of attraction in the same pieces. . . . This point, however, is rarely attained in Mr. Stevenson's verse."—Sat. Rev., lix. 394.

10. Prince Otto: a Romance, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"The ordinary material of the novel he throws aside; in half a dozen sentences he gives the results of a whole volume of realism; he goes straight to the quick of things, and concerns himself with none but essentials. . . . The author's theme is the morals of marriage. . . . 'Prince Otto' is a protest against the existence of most of that which is unworthy in the theory and practice of modern literature."—Ath., No. 3030.

11. Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Stevenson's idea, his secret, (but a very open secret,) is that of the double personality in every man. . . . While one is thrilled and possessed by the horror of the central fancy, one may fail, at first reading, to recognize the delicate and restrained skill of the treatment of accessories, details, and character."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 55.

"In form it is but a simple tale of magical transformations, yet few sermons could pronounce more awful warning against a sinful life."—Nation, xlii. 196.

12. Kidnapped: being Memoirs of the Adventures of David Balfour in the Year 1751: how he was Kidnapped and Cast Away; his Sufferings in a Desert Island; his Journey in the Wild Highlands; his Acquaintance with Alan Breck Stewart and other Notorious Highland Jacobites; with All that he suffered at the Hands of his Uncle, Ebenezer Balfour of Shaws, falsely so called: written by Himself, and now set forth, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"While this book is not quite so unique as 'Treasure Island,' it has perhaps even more of the qualities proper to all true literature."—Spectator, lix. 990.

"In the Highland portions the imagination is of an exceedingly high and rare kind. The scenes are flashed not only upon the mental vision but upon the actual senses of the reader. And even in the earlier chapters, where there is but little imagination in this narrow sense, we come upon single touches where there is imagination, but then it leaps up in a short, sudden, dazzling flame, as when the cry forced from the murderous uncle by superstitious terror is likened in sound to a sheep's bleat."—Ath., No. 3068.

"'Kidnapped' is as fresh and strong, as thorough in workmanship and well sustained in interest, as anything which he has yet given to the world, 'Treasure Island' itself not excepted."—Sat. Rev., lxii. 195.

13. The Merry Men, and other Tales and Fables, Lon., 1887, p. 8vo.

"The two really remarkable stories are 'The Merry Men' and the short sketch entitled 'Thrawn Janet.' Mere horror is easily conjured up, but it is only under the power of genius that horror can permanently fascinate."—Acad., xxxi. 144.

14. Underwoods, [verse,] Lon., 1887, cr. 8vo.

"There is in these poems little or nothing either of that originality or of that satisfying beauty which conjointly characterize Mr. Stevenson's best prose."—WILLIAM SHARP: Acad., xxxii. 213.

"His language is well selected and beautiful, his thoughts are graceful and intellectually stimulating or satisfying, and the whole has a music at once caressing and provocative. . . . On the other hand, his happiest phrases come short of full inspiration."—Ath., No. 3124.

15. Memories and Portraits, Lon., 1887, 12mo. (Consists of essays, many of which had appeared in periodicals.) 16. The Black Arrow: a Tale of the Two Roses, Lon., 1888, cr. 8vo.

"If 'Ivanhoe' be the most brilliant tale for boys which genius ever penned, 'The Black Arrow' certainly deserves to be mentioned next to it as one which, without even suggesting an imitator, displays a master-hand in the same field."—Spectator, lxi. 1099.

17. The Master of Ballantrae, Lon., 1889, p. 8vo. With STEVENSON, FANNY VAN DE GRIFT, The Dynamiter: more New Arabian Nights, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"Those . . . to whom the 'Suicide Club' and the 'Pavilion on the Links' are already classics will find the 'Dynamiter' equally charming. . . . Again Mr. Stevenson shows his unique power of vivid and penetrative language, his absolute command of the right word. Never was a work 'of an inexact and even painful description' written in such dainty and lucid English, or with so light a play of wit."—Acad., xxvii. 358.

And see JENKIN, FLEEMING, supra.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"He is the true gypsy and wandering entertainer of the time, beguiling us with song and fortune-telling. . . . In the full tide of realism and of analysis Mr. Stevenson stands for the romantic spirit, and has constituted himself the defender of bygone faiths, the champion and reviver, by precept and practice, of the much-abused story for its own sake. He brings back old chivalries and piracies, and talks to the boyhood of to-day of shipwrecks and high-waymen as if these venerable objects of worship had not been superseded long ago by mercantile heroes and dollar-coining newsboys. If it is not absolutely incumbent upon readers to decide beforehand and forever the question between realism and romance; if it be permitted to rejoice heartily in the truest phase and intention of each, to wave a welcome to the van of either procession and escape the rabble at its end, then let us enjoy without odorous comparisons our Stevensonian romance, and rest satisfied that invention has its truths and falsehoods as well as fact."—SOPHIA KIRK: Atlantic Monthly, lx. 747.

"Before all things he is a writer with a style,—a model with a complexity of curious and picturesque garments. It is by the cut and color of this rich and becoming frippery—I use the term endearingly, as a painter might—that he arrests the eye and solicits the brush. That is, frankly, half the charm he has for us, that he wears a dress and wears it with courage, with a certain cock of the hat and tinkle of the supererogatory sword; or, in other words, that he is curious of expression, and regards the literary form not simply as a code of signals, but as the key-board of a piano and as so much plastic material. . . . Much as he cares for his phrase, he cares more for life, and for a certain transcendently lovable part of it. . . . The part of life that he cares most for is youth, and the direct expression of the love of youth is the beginning and the end of his message. His appreciation of this delightful period amounts to a passion; and a passion, in the age in which we live, strikes us, on the whole, as a sufficient philosophy. . . . Mingled with his almost equal love of a literary surface it represents a real originality."—HENRY JAMES: The Century Magazine, xxxv. (xiii.) 869.

"This curious genius, springing from a family of Scottish engineers, resembles nothing so much as one of the fairy children whom the ladies of Queen Proserpina's court used to leave in the cradles of Border keeps or of peasants' cottages. Of the Scot he has little beyond the power of touching us with a sense of the supernatural, and a decided habit of moralizing. . . . Critics of every sort have been kind to Mr. Stevenson. . . . Thus he has become a kind of classic in his own day, for an undisputed reputation makes a classic while it lasts. But was ever so much fame won by writings which might be called scrappy and desultory by the advocatus diaboli? It is a most miscellaneous literary baggage that Mr. Stevenson carries. . . . It is all good, though variously good; yet the wise world asks for the masterpiece. . . . In his tales his minor characters are as carefully drawn as his chief personages. . . . They are the work of a mind as attentive to details as ready to subordinate or obliterate details which are unessential. Thus Mr. Stevenson's writings breathe equally of work in the study and of inspiration from adventure in the open air, and thus he wins every vote and pleases every class of reader."—ANDREW LANG: Essays in Little, Amer. ed., 25-35.

The remaining forms of energy are then explained, and the law of its conservation is stated, and its operation traced through all varieties of transmutations. An historical sketch of the progress of the science, and an examination of Professor Thomson's correlative theory of the Dissipation of Energy, follow; and the work concludes with a chapter on the Position of Life. . . . The style is all that it should be, it is difficult to understand how so much information can be contained in so few words."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 116.

"We can hardly call it a plan of reform, because the chance of any adoption of its suggestions is too remote; but it is certainly an excellent and important contribution to the body of grave, we will not say alarmed, reflection which the present working of party government in the United States is causing among all classes and conditions." —Nation, xxix. 160.

It is rather a copious selection of material for a critical biography than such a biography itself. . . . "'Roundabout Rambles' was so very well told a collection of stories that it was natural to suspect Mr. Stockton's heaven-born mission to be writing for children. "The story . . . is quite amusing, not too violently extravagant, and not vulgar at all."—Nation, xxix. 30.

"The charm which lies behind the drollery of 'Rudder Grange' . . . is in its sweetness and bucolic simplicity. It stops just short, too, of the extravagance which makes much of our fun heavy,—or would stop short if the author would only omit the last two chapters. . . . The faithfulness with which the characters are drawn gives the book a position much above that of most contemporaneous fun." —Atlantic Monthly, xlvi. 417.

"In following . . . the sinuous stream of his easily-flowing fiction we seldom come to a downright cascade of irresistible and resounding laughter. But with a gentle, ceaseless murmur of amusement and a flickering twinkle of smiles the story moves steadily on in the calm triumph of its assured and unassailable absurdity, its logical and indisputable impossibility. There is nothing in the world more sweetly reasonable than the narrator's tone. By the absence of merely superficial eccentricities in the deeply eccentric persons he chooses to depict, and the lucid sincerity of style with which he reports their doings, he produces a perfect illusion."—Critic, viii. 229.

"The pieces that seem to us to be the best, as being most distinctively the poet's own, are some which express, with a reserve or vagueness of suggestion which is taking, some evanescent mood of mind, or, perhaps we might better say, some moodiness of feeling. . . . They are not for all times, perhaps, any more than for all time; but now and again, when the reader's mood helps the author, they serve and will be welcome. . . . Mr. Stoddard occasionally makes a lyric which is gay with a sort of gaiety which we should guess to be not immediately his own, but his secondarily rather, and reflexively."—Nation, xiii. 341.

"Throughout the whole work Dr. Stoughton exhibits great impartiality and candour, and his criticisms are distinguished by their freedom from the bias of party; but, notwithstanding, it is sufficiently apparent that, beyond the mere investigation of facts, he aims at the illustration of a principle. Conscientiously opposed to the connection between Church and State, he selects for special prominence whatever would seem to show the disadvantages and evils resulting from such a connection."—J. "It forms the most trustworthy record which has yet been given to the public of the momentous administrative changes by which the old India of the Company has been silently, skilfully, and securely remodelled into the new India of the Queen. In that deliberate revolution, probably the two most powerful, and certainly the two most permanent, human factors have been the brothers Strachey. . . . In less than four hundred pages Sir John Strachey has furnished an account at once comprehensive and exact of the India which he has seen, and of the measures in which he has played so important a part. His impressions regarding provinces and races which lay beyond his own observation are not always quite accurate, nor does he seem to have perfectly gauged the significance of certain movements and changes which have taken place since he left India. But these deficiencies, as they seem to me, might not be reckoned deficiencies by others and they do not interfere with the value of the great storehouse of personal experience and personal knowledge which he has thrown open to the reader."—W. "There is a ring about this little volume which has not been heard often of late in the speech of English clergymen,—scarcely, indeed, since 'Parson Lot' was delivering his soul in 'Politics for the People' and the 'Christian Socialist,' in the crisis of the Chartist agitation thirty years ago. . . . The strength and worth of the book lie in its hopefulness, that most democratic and yet most Christian virtue; and the ground of all his hopes for the rural poor lies in association. That is his last word, as it is fast coming to be the last word of all those who can look the signs of their time squarely in the face."—Spectator, li. 1369.

The Constitutional History of England in its Origin and Development, Oxf., 1874–78, 3 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1880.

"The work of Mr. Stubbs is the first Constitutional History of England, at once minute and continuous, which has been undertaken since a wholly new light has been thrown upon matters of this kind by the researches of the great German writers, Waitz, the two Maurers, and others. . . . It shows the millenniums through which we seem to have lived in point of historical insight within a very few generations, if we compare the fulness, the scientific precision, the wide comparative grasp, of the opening chapters of Mr. Stubbs's History with the childish talk of Blackstone or even with the meagreness of Hallam. . . . The book is, in short, a masterpiece. . . . It is brimful of all the knowledge on the subject scientifically treated and orderly arranged."—Sat. Rev., xxxviii. 214.

"The central and dominant idea of the book may be said to be that English constitutional history is the history of an evolution, and an evolution mainly from Teutonic elements. . . . Neither in blood nor in institution does Mr. Stubbs trace anything English either to British or to Roman sources. . . . His dominant idea on this point leads Mr. Stubbs to underrate, we think, some non-German influences, and, for example, to attach scarcely sufficient importance to the part of the church or the clergy in shaping the English polity and institutions during the centuries between the introduction of Christianity and the Norman Conquest."—Ath., No. 2422.

"Though his subject formally ends before the beginning of the sixteenth century, yet he gives us incidental sketches both of the sixteenth century and of the seventeenth. He has an estimate both of the Tudor and of the Stuart reigns; and the hand which has painted the early Angevins in full has drawn life-like miniatures of Charles the First and of the later Cromwell. In these short sketches Mr. Stubbs shows the same keen insight and amazing impartiality which he shows everywhere. . . . He contrives to be the partisan, he certainly can be the spokesman, of all sides at once. So it is with institutions. . . . He thoroughly sees that there is no ideally best set of institutions, but that any form of government which deserves the name may be best or worst, according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners. . . . As it now stands, Mr. Stubbs's Constitutional History, even if it stood by itself, without the other great, though less systematic, writings which have come from the same pen, would be the worthy work of a life."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 692, 730.

"Mr. Stubbs might certainly have done more to dissipate some prevalent delusions. Unfortunately, as I cannot help thinking, he has not quite succeeded in even emancipating his own mind from them. But what he has done is invaluable. He has at least thoroughly surveyed the whole ground. There is absolutely nothing material to the subject that he has not investigated, and investigated with perfect candour. Whatever may be said of his generalizations, his facts are perfectly trustworthy, and even one who differs from his point of view may really be content to rest the whole controversy on statements made by himself. There is no fear, certainly, that the work will be superseded for many a long day—if, indeed, it ever can be superseded—as a perfect magazine of facts relating to constitutional history in the Middle Ages."—JAMES GAIRDNER: Acad., xiii. 291.

3. Little Comedies, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo; new ed., enl., 1882.

"Mr. Sturgis's 'Little Comedies,' which are always little and sometimes comedies, are six in number,—two in verse and the rest in prose. . . . All are sprightly and delicate and graceful and human; all are worth reading, one at least is worth pondering and remembering."—Ath., No. 2737.

"Mr. Sturgis's 'Little Comedies' were originally but six in number; now they are thirteen, three of which are in verse. . . . All are neatly and intelligently constructed, and only need competent and sympathetic acting to appear with advantage on the stage."—Ath., No. 2832.

"It is a very interesting and, to a certain extent, a very instructive book. It is written always with vigour and liveliness, and generally with impartiality and good sense. But it is very defective in method. . . . After reading Mr. Sullivan's book we are led to the conclusion that the Home Rule movement is not so much a movement for anything in particular as a consolation and vent to Irish feeling."—*Sat. He became a contributor to the Saturday, Fortnightly, and Westminster Reviews about 1871; he has also contributed to Mind, and to the Ninth Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, and has lectured on psychology, logic, and pedagogics in London, Cambridge, &c. 1. Sensation and Intuition: Studies in Psychology and Æsthetics, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 2d ed., 1880.

"The materials furnished by a quick and lively natural sense are happily ordered by a mind trained in scientific method. This merit is especially conspicuous in those parts of the book where, with abundant ingenuity and no mean success, Mr. Sully endeavours to throw some light of cosmic order into the chaos of æsthetics."—*Sat. 3. Illusions: a Psychological Study, ("International Scientific" Ser.,) Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Sully's analysis of his whole subject leaves us at the close impressed, on the one hand, with the ability of the writer's treatment; on the other, with the force of his practical conclusion that our intuitions or perceptions of things are more relatively than absolutely true, and that . . . the true standard of reality, as opposed to illusion, is a stable consensus of general belief."—Sat. Rev., lii. 141.

4. Outlines of Psychology: with Special Reference to the Theory of Education, Lon., 1884, 8vo; 2d ed., 1885.

"The value of the work may be said to consist mainly in a convenient restatement of the doctrine and analyses of the English school of psychology, so rearranged as to leave space for all that is known and part of what is foreboded as to the physiology of sensation and thought. . . . The 'Outlines' may be welcomed as a substantially reliable introduction to psychology; while the educational addenda are enriched with remarks, some of which, we hope, may get indelibly registered in the nervous system of the rising generation of teachers."—EDITH SIMCOX: Acad., xxv. 359.

"The work of Canon Swainson must take a high place in the department of literature to which it belongs. Indeed, its value can scarcely be overrated. Henceforward it will be considered the book on the Athanasian Creed,—a standard treatise of permanent worth. Full of learning, breathing a fair and catholic spirit, evidencing patient and long-continued study, it commends itself to the churchman and the dissenter, to the ecclesiastical historian and the theologian, as a compendium of facts and documents, a well-written text-book with which they cannot dispense."—Ath., No. 2489.

Swinburne, Algernon Charles, [see ante, vol. ii., where the date and place of his birth are incorrectly given,] b. 1843, in Chester Street, Grosvenor Place, London; son of the late Admiral Charles Henry Swinburne, and of his wife, Lady Jane Henrietta, daughter of the third Earl of Ashburnham; was educated in France, and entered Balliol College, Oxford, in 1857. During his stay at the university, which he left without taking a degree, he was one of a small band of students who wrote and published a periodical entitled "Undergraduate Papers." After leaving Oxford he spent some time in Florence with Walter Savage Landor. He has contributed to the Fortnightly Review and to the Encyclopædia Britannica. 1. Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic, September 4, 1870, Lon., 1870, 8vo. 2. Songs before Sunrise, Lon., 1871, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Swinburne perhaps acts wisely in scattering through his writings passages so utterly devoid of sense as to force his readers to believe that they must spring from a disordered brain. . . . And yet among all this extravagance, this fustian worthy of a second Ancient Pistol, there are lines, stanzas, and poems which are in every way admirable. Indeed, there is, we believe, more real poetic power shown in this volume than in any of the poet's earlier works."—Sat. Rev., xxxi. 54.

"The misfortune of his present book is, that his subjects are allegorical rather than individual. . . . Whenever he gets a chance of blending his passion for freedom with descriptions of nature, we are struck once more by that marvellous power—in which he has no superior—of quickening material things with a spirit of conscious life, and of leaving all their features more salient and defined through the higher analogies by which he interprets them." —Ath., No. 2255.

3. Under the Microscope, Lon., 1872, 12mo. 4. Bothwell: a Tragedy, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo.

"Ignorant, apparently, or oblivious of the laws of construction and proportion, Mr. Swinburne has heaped together the valuable stores he has accumulated, and has given us a mound where we looked for a temple. . . . How lamentable a mistake has been made will be known to the few who read the book through, and see what fine, what magnificent things are there to reward exertion. . . . Splendid pictures, subtle analyses of passion, and wonderful studies of character, will repay him who attains the end. As art, however, the whole is incomprehensible. As a picture, this work of a man of genius is without central interest; as a play, it is without a climax."—Ath., No. 2430.

5. Songs of Two Nations, Lon., 1875, p. 8vo. (Contains the "Song of Italy," "Ode on the French Republic," and "Diræ.") 6. Essays and Studies, Lon., 1875, p. 8vo; 2d ed., 1876.

"His genius is for style simply, and not in the least for thought nor for real analysis; he goes through the motions of criticism, and makes a considerable show of logic and philosophy, but with deep appreciation his writing seems to us to have very little to do."—Nation, (Henry James,) xxi. 73.

"His wealth and command of words give him a singular power of throwing a general atmosphere and colouring over his treatment of a subject, which go for much in the resulting impression, and at first seem to be the whole impression. But the rich veil of diction clothes, though it may for a time disguise, definite thoughts which emerge unexpectedly. One feels tempted to say that it is magnificent, but it is not prose. . . . Another remarkable feature of these essays is the power of what we must call, for want of a better or more definite name, literary delineation. . . . The critic aims at giving us a continuous picture of the whole artistic personality in which all particular qualities are centred."—Sat. Rev., xl. 54.

"A long and noble fragment of Euripides, preserved by Lycurgus, the orator, in his oration against Leocrates,—his one surviving work,—has supplied Mr. Swinburne with his subject. . . . It may, perhaps, be . . . doubted whether the passages in which Mr. Swinburne approaches closest to his model are the happiest, or whether he is not most himself when, as in the two odes respectively descriptive of the North-wind and the commencement of battle, he gives the rein to his imagination and indulges in a prodigality of splendid imagery such as finds no place in Greek literature."—Ath., No. 2514.

"The prayer of the quiet, strong little woman of the Haworth moors, who 'had no nonsense about her,' if ever that supreme praise might be applied to a woman, could she have had foreknowledge of Mr. Swinburne's intentions in her regard, would surely have been that often-quoted one, 'Save me from my friends!' Extravagance run mad, and panting English epithets toiling after it in vain, form the sum of Mr. Swinburne's 'Note.'"—Spectator, l. 1095.

11. Poems and Ballads. Second Series. Lon., 1878, cr. 8vo.

"Notwithstanding the violence of some of the political sonnets, this volume is in no way unworthy of the position he has taken. Moreover, it displays a love of nature such as was not seen in his previous books."—Ath., No. 2745.

12. A Study of Shakespeare, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"Much more sober and dignified in style, and much less overweighted with ornament, than anything we have received from his pen of late years. . . . When Mr. Swinburne is happy and alert, his sentences are admirable; but when he is constrained by the nature of his theme to traverse ground which does not specially attract him, he reminds us of Satan pursuing that arduous earthward journey outside the gates of Hell. . . . The great interest of this newest study is the light which Mr. Swinburne throws on missing links and collateral branches of the main argument."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 159.

"Mr. Swinburne's passion for the sea is well known: in writing about it he is always at his best, and in this book it is clear that he has caught those very sea secrets which only Coleridge among poets has caught before him. His present volume consists of three poems of some length, which, as the descriptions are chiefly of the sea and the sea-coast, have a connection with each other, followed by a birthday ode to Victor Hugo."—Ath., No. 2743.

"Mr. Swinburne's new poems seem to us prolonged and tedious repetitions of old themes, often obscure and personal in allusion, and almost always clouded with mists of words and noisy with the shock of adjectives."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 698.

15. Studies in Song, Lon., 1880, p. 8vo.

"He has no curious nor profound thoughts to explain, and he appears to have never come in contact with the world; he knows nothing of its sorrows, its delights, its hopes; at least, he cannot identify himself with them and mould them into poems, as Mr. Tennyson or Mr. Browning. He therefore stands apart, and sings of grief, love, hate, and despair as abstract sentiments. . . . The artist who limits himself to the abstract soon finds himself at the end of his tether. Love, hate, hope, and despair have been sung of in the first volume; in the second, third, and fourth he sings of them again, in a different set of phrases; but after a little time this becomes no more fruitful in surprises than a game of dominoes. This is exactly Mr. Swinburne's present position; he has sung of the strength of the sea and of death, and he sings of them again precisely as he sang of them before. . . . There is nothing exact, nothing complete, nothing true; no observation, no delineation of character or sentiment; nothing, either physiological or psychological."—Spectator, liv. 316.

16. Mary Stuart: a Tragedy, Lon., 1881, p. 8vo.

"The play is, as it strikes us, undramatic, by which we do not mean merely untheatrical. If it does not 'lose the name of action,' yet the action moves so slowly, and at such length, that the interest of a reader cannot but flag at some points where it should be most aroused. The verse is throughout fine, and it need hardly be said that many passages are striking and in every way worthy of their author; but they are, on the whole, outweighed by the mass of mere talk, which is indeed framed in words that are fine in the best sense, but are superfluous so far as the development of character and action is concerned."—Sat. Rev., lii. 702.

17. Tristram of Lyonesse, and other Poems, Lon., 1882. p. 8vo.

"This is the most varied and important volume of verse that Mr. Swinburne has yet published, and in all probability it will be the most popular. Wider in its appeal than any previous book of his,—more romantic, too, and more interesting, it yet retains the rhythmical power and prophetic passion which have hitherto been the most noticeable characteristics of his work."—Ath., No. 2856.

"'Tristram of Lyonesse' is full of genius,—too full of passion, because the passion is not the higher imaginative passion, but an imaginative expression of the lowest physical passion,—but in its elements confused and sadly wanting in clearness of outline. There are glorious flashes of sunlight in it, but not unfrequently, for pages together, the words, fine as they are, are more like the lavish spray of a waterfall flashing in the sunlight or glimmering in the shade, than the interpreters to the mind of any definite and specific meaning."—Spectator, lv. 1055.

18. A Century of Roundels, Lon., 1883, 4to.

"The restraint imposed on him by the vehicle he has chosen is obviously an advantage in one respect. His great faults, diffuseness of expression and looseness of thought, are here held in check by the chains to which he has subjected himself; on the other hand, his greatest merits, his rush of emotion and verbal movement, cannot find vent here."—Ath., No. 2903.

19. A Midsummer Holiday, and other Poems, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Altogether, this volume shows a vigour of hand, a brilliant mastery over artistic means towards artistic ends, such as Mr. Swinburne has never surpassed and rarely equalled." —Ath., No. 2978.

20. Marino Faliero: a Tragedy, Lon., 1885, p. 8vo.

"Though neither Mr. Swinburne nor any one else could make such a motive as that of Marino Faliero's revenge strong enough to support a five-act play,—especially a play full of such magnificent writing as Mr. Swinburne was sure to put into it,—he has, by the importation of other issues,—love and patriotism,—produced a tragedy of a noble and, in many respects, of a unique kind."—Ath., No. 3007.

21. Miscellanies, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"Of the judicial faculty—which is, in other words, the faculty of seeing things as they are, despite any temptation to see them as they are not—Mr. Swinburne has not even a trace. . . . When . . . his enthusiastic love of literature has free play, . . . then, and very often, he writes admirable sense, and puts it in language which is more than admirable."—Sat. Rev., lxii. 100.

22. A Study of Victor Hugo, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"Not for a moment does Mr. Swinburne hesitate or quail to place the object of his adoration alongside the very greatest names in the literature of the world. . . . Apart altogether from the critic's own comments, the facts of Hugo's literary life are focussed with so much knowledge and so much skill, the selections from Hugo's poetry are so admirably made, . . . that to the French as well as to the English student the book is quite indispensable."—Ath., No. 3046.

23. Locrine: a Tragedy, Lon., 1887, p. 8vo.

"That under such artistic restrictions as he has chosen for himself, Mr. Swinburne should have produced a poem so full of dramatic life as 'Locrine' is really wonderful. Guendolen is one of the strongest characters in nineteenth-century drama. In her we get not so much love turned to hate as love at war with hate,—a much more subtle conception. Locrine, too, is a living man, and Sabrina is exceedingly winsome. Altogether the book must add to Mr. Swinburne's reputation. Of beauties of a purely poetic kind the play is more full than anything Mr. Swinburne has before given the public in dramatic form."—Ath., No. 3139.

24. Selections from his Poetical Works, Lon., 1887, 12mo. (Selections understood to have been made by the author.)

General Criticism:

"The high claims of his political and philosophical poetry rest upon the swing and rush of versification, the vigour and vehemence of diction, the grand musical effect, clashing and chiming like some great cataract, far more than upon the reiteration of a few unfruitful and unoriginal ideas."—R. Garnett: art. Literature, in The Reign of Queen Victoria, ii. 487.

"No one of his faults happens to be of those which are fatal to a great poet; and all his merits are those which are to a great poet necessary. Above all, he has the one thing needful,—he sings."—George Saintsbury: Acad., xiii. 25.

"Before the advent of Swinburne we did not realize the full scope of English verse. In his hands it is like the violin of Paganini. The range of his fantasias, roulades, arias, new effects of measure and sound is incomparable with anything hitherto known."—E. C. Stedman: Victorian Poets, 380.

"No living English poet is in certain ways more brilliant or powerful than Mr. Swinburne, and it would be difficult to name any who is so unequal to himself. . . . He plays on the English language as a musical instrument, and is never weary of producing new studies and variations of its tones. Many of his slighter pieces must be regarded purely as such studies. . . . It would be perverse to demand a serious meaning in them."—Sat. Rev., xlvi. 85.

"His nature is essentially yielding and receptive, with stormy gusts of passion and indiscriminating impulses of emotion. There is no strong masculine formative quality about him, which explains why he uses so many adjectives and suggests so few thoughts. . . . The total impression left on us by Swinburne's prose is the same as that of his verse. Brilliantly gifted, profusely voluble, passionately rhetorical, it puts before us too often phrases instead of thoughts, verbal contortions instead of conceptions. . . . Mr. Swinburne is, however artistic, yet not an artist, and however cultured, yet still an amateur: for he is not creative, not original in the best and largest sense of the word, because not instinct with illuminating ideas."—W. "It is, unfortunately, deficient in the clear judgment and logical analysis which the subjects discussed require for their proper elucidation. Yet readers of very different tastes may find the work interesting and instructive. The naturalist will appreciate the close observation of insect life displayed by the writer, and will find the large assemblage of facts which he has industriously brought together of considerable value; while to the less scientific the picturesque descriptions of scenery and of insect habits, the wealth of literary quotation and allusion, the eccentric style and the enigmatical philosophy, will have a greater attraction."—Alfred R. "Mr. Syme has a very low opinion of the British Constitution. It is cumbrous, it is unwieldy, it does very little, and even that little it does ill. . . . He makes the specific suggestion that the constituencies shall have the same power over their representatives which the Crown exercises over Parliament,—namely, the power of dismissal."—Spectator, lv. 364.

Symonds, H. C., formerly major and commissary of subsistence in the army of the United States. Report of a Commissary of Subsistence 1861-65, Sing Sing, N. York, 1888.

"'Recollections of a Commissary' would be a more suitable title. . . . The book throws valuable side-lights upon some important questions of history."—Nation, xlvii. 198.

Symonds, John Addington, M.D., F.R.C.P., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1807-1871, b. at Aston, Oxfordshire, and educated at Edinburgh; practised medicine at Bristol, where he was physician to the hospital. In 1851 he removed to Clifton. Miscellanies: Selected and Edited, with an Introductory Memoir, by his Son, Lon. and Bristol, 1871, 8vo. Also, single lectures.

Symonds, John Addington, son of the preceding, b. 1840, at Bristol, Eng.; was educated at Harrow School, and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained the Newdigate prize and a first class in Classics in 1862 and was elected to a Fellowship at Magdalen College. He has for many years been obliged on account of ill health to reside at Davos-Platz in Switzerland. 1. An Introduction to the Study of Dante, Lon., 1872, p. 8vo.

"It is rather a series of criticisms on Dante than an introduction to his poems."—Ath., No. 2353.

2. Studies of the Greek Poets, Lon., 1873-76, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"They popularize the results of scholarship with great ability. They are neither very profound nor flimsily superficial. They hit the right level of pleasurable reading; and, while they demand an educated mind for their full appreciation, they yield much which will inform and interest those who know merely the broader facts of ancient history and a few of the greater literary names. . . . It would not be difficult to cite a good many passages in which we feel carried off our legs by the rush of promiscuous imagery; but this is readily condoned by a reader of any generosity, as a result perhaps inseparable from the enthusiasm for his subject without which the book would lose all its fascination and much of its solid value."—Sat. Rev., xxxvi. 379.

"While we have careful and scholarly analyses of the books and their contents, Mr. Symonds never forgets to show us how these contents are lighted up and made really and completely intelligible only in so far as we enter into the mental and social conditions of the writers and of their original readers, and verify thereby the thoughts and feelings which they have still power to call forth in themselves."—Spectator, xlix. 954.

3. Sketches in Italy and Greece, Lon., 1874, p. 8vo.

"Sketches is perhaps scarcely the right word for pictures of travel so careful in composition, so finished and elaborate, as these by Mr. Symonds. . . . He brings before the reader the very secret of the charm of Perugia or Girgenti; he grasps and expresses the personality, as it were, of Ravenna or of Orvieto; he conveys the sentiment of Syracuse or Athens. . . . Sometimes we may think that the colour and beauty of mere words becomes a a temptation to him, that his style has a southern fragrance as heavy as that of the lemon-blossoms, and a glitter in Asiatic taste."—A. LANG: Acad., v. 505.

4. Renaissance in Italy: the Age of the Despots, Lon., 1875, 8vo; 2d ed., 1880.

"The present volume . . . is historical, and shows us the political and social conditions in and out of which Italy and then the rest of Europe awoke to new life. Yet it is not . . . a history proper, but rather a light by which to read all Italian histories."—Spectator, xlviii. 953.

5. Renaissance in Italy: the Revival of Learning, Lon., 1877, 8vo.

"He has waded through amazing expanses of the dullest, the dirtiest, the most tedious literature, . . . and has compressed the result of his search into a goodly, but still a handy, volume . . . Excellent as it is by itself as an addition to general culture, the volume will probably gain when read in its proper place, in connection with the author's works on Italian art and Italian literature."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 584.

6. Renaissance in Italy: the Fine Arts, Lon., 1877, 8vo.

"He tells us that he 'does not pretend to retrace the history of the Italian arts, but rather to define their relations to the main movement of Renaissance culture.' In this retrospective view he goes as far back as the end of the thirteenth century. . . . Mr. Symonds has consulted the best written authorities; but he rightly attaches more importance to that personal knowledge of pictorial, plastic, and structural works which forms the premises to the argument. . . . His descriptions show quick perceptions, and kindle into eloquence under a diction which sometimes has less of the sobriety of the historian than of the ardour of the rhapsodist."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 181.

"To the subjects which he treats in this volume Mr. Symonds brings an insight both intelligent and sympathetic; in expression he is copious and facile; but the exact and final phrase, I think, he does not often hit."—SIDNEY COLVIN: Acad., xii. 122.

7. Renaissance in Italy: Italian Literature. In Two Parts. Lon., 1881, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The two volumes give the completest account of the subject yet published in English; and they include, besides what belongs strictly to the period of the Renaissance, introductory chapters of great interest, tracing the earlier growth of the Italian language and literature. Of the whole series they form probably the most practically useful part."—Sat. Rev., lii. 236.

8. Renaissance in Italy: the Catholic Reaction, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Symonds's two volumes form a very necessary supplement to his history of the Renaissance. . . . It is perhaps to be regretted that the author has not cast it more in the form of a regular history, instead of a series of essays. . . . As it stands, it is calculated rather to stimulate than to satisfy the serious student of the period."—Ath., No. 3084.

"Mr. Symonds's study of the Renaissance . . . must certainly rank among the considerable literary monuments of our time. It is a learned, a thoughtful, and a brilliant book. The author knows a great deal about his subject, weighs carefully what he has to say regarding it, and expresses himself with precision and strength, and often with eloquence. . . . Mr. Symonds is not dogmatic or pragmatic, but he is confident in his own views; and as these are founded upon extensive and minute studies, his confidence is in the main a benefit to the reader, who is thus furnished with distinct results rather than suggestions, suppositions, or notions still in process of formation."—Ath., No. 2811.

9. The Sonnets of Michael Angelo Buonarotti and Tommaso Campanella, now for the First Time Translated into Rhymed English, Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"The translator has made a real, a definite, and, I think, an enduring addition to the spiritual wealth of English readers."—E. DOWDEN: Acad., xiii. 247.

10. Many Moods: a Volume of Verse, Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"As a descriptive poet Mr. Symonds cannot take a high rank, but as a poet of emotion and speculation, and a finished sonneteer, he can certainly hold his own."—Ath., No. 2644.

"He tells us modestly in his preface that he does not claim 'the sacred name of a poet,' but this volume assuredly entitles him to a place, and to a place of distinction, among living poets."—Spectator, li. 1185.

11. Shelley, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1878, p. 8vo.

"It is written with knowledge, grace, and tact."—Ath., No. 2662.

"Mr. Symonds is a refined and enthusiastic writer, and enters into the transcendent beauties of Shelley's genius with an ardent and a thoughtful admiration. But he takes no intelligible standard with him by which to try Shelley's curiously tainted nobility of nature."—Spectator, li. 1401.

12. Sketches and Studies in Italy, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.

"Consists in part of sketches of Italian life and landscape, in part of critical studies, written perhaps in Italy, and dealing with Italian or old Roman topics. . . . Where it answers to the first part of its title . . . it is thoroughly good. The 'Studies' are of less equal value."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 624.

13. New and Old: a Volume of Verse, Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"To some extent the poetry of Mr. Symonds evinces the self-reliant boldness which is one element of originality, yet his best efforts are so far less numerous than those which belong to verse of mere taste and sentiment that it may be doubted whether the former will make their due impression."—Ath., No. 2672.

14. Animi Figura, Lon., 1882, 12mo.

"This interesting volume is made up of a series of sonnet-sequences, each sequence being the soul's dialogue with itself concerning some problem or mystery of life, or some special experience of the lover of beauty who is at the same time a lover of truth."—E. DOWDEN: Acad., xxii. 3.

15. Italian Byways, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"Though the author's account of what he has seen, and of the associations which it awakes in his mind, is given in language too exuberant for the taste of persons brought up on plain English, the intelligence and learning of the book, as of all Mr. Symonds's, must give it considerable value."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 52.

16. Shakspeare's Predecessors in the English Drama, Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"Goes down only to the death of Marlowe. . . . He is always conscious that there is a great deal to say, and laudably anxious to say it well; but his consciousness of how much there is not to say would appear to be much less keen. . . . The most rigid critic must pronounce the book a good and useful one, containing not only much sound criticism, but a general view of literature which is very well worth viewing, and which few readers are likely to have the opportunity of examining at first hand."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 481.

17. Wine, Woman, and Song: Mediæval Songs in English Verse, Lon., 1884, 12mo.

"The title of the book might lead the hasty bibliographer to treat it as a frivolous performance with no particular purpose; but it is, in fact, a serious contribution to literary history in the shape of an admirably written critical essay on the Latin songs of twelfth-century students, freely interspersed with spirited English translations."—Ath., No. 2991.

18. Vagabundi Libellus, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Even those who appreciate the sonnet most highly may well feel disheartened, and almost appalled, when they open a volume of over 200 pages which has a sonnet on every page. . . . Many of Mr. Symonds's sonnets lack only one thing, but it happens to be the one thing needful,—an interesting and sufficing theme."—Spectator, lviii. 392.

19. Sir Philip Sidney, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"There are plenty of readers who will doubtless be fascinated by Mr. Symonds's well-written narrative, which rightly treats Sidney as something more than a man of letters, and the critical expositions of Sidney's writings will certainly be of service to those who do not possess Sidney's books. But the biography is little more than a résumé of Mr. Fox Bourne's well-known work."—Ath., No. 3089.

20. Ben Jonson, ("English Worthies,") Lon., 1886, p. 8vo.

"It is a work that the student of to-day cannot so safely neglect as he may the writings which it lauds and analyzes so well."—Spectator, lx. 770.

Taylor, Bayard, [ante, vol. iii., add.,] 1825–1878. (He was named after James A. Bayard, and sometimes used the signature "J. Bayard Taylor" in early life, which led to the erroneous form in which his name appeared on the title-page of his first book.) His life continued to be one of alternate travel, lecturing, and newspaper work in the office of the New York Tribune until he was appointed U.S. minister to Germany, less than a year before his death. He had been long collecting materials for a Life of Goethe, but the composition of the work was never begun. For biog., see TAYLOR, MARIE HANSEN, and SCUDDER, HORACE E., infra. 1. Faust: a Tragedy. By Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Translated in the Original Metres. Bost., 1870–71, 2 vols. 4to; Lon., 1871, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Leipsic, 1871–76, 2 vols.; later editions in America, 2 vols. 12mo.

"Fully to appreciate the success with which he has triumphed over many of the difficulties in rhythm and sense which a poem like 'Faust' presents to a translator, one must make a careful comparison of his translation with previous efforts. . . . We find for the most part in the language selected a delicacy of ear and a justness of perception which leave little to be desired. . . . Altogether we think it can be safely maintained that the rich and varied music of 'Faust' has never before been so faithfully represented to English ears. In single passages we should still prefer the utterances of some of Mr. Taylor's models; but for a general high average of excellence we think his work will have many advantages over its competitors."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 371. (Notice of the First Part.)

"To our mind he has had a better success than any metrical predecessor of his who has attempted the 'Faust' as a whole. With Hayward's prose translation for the sense, and Mr. Taylor's for the metres, and for collateral light on numerous passages, the reader who knows no German may get as good an idea of the poem as is perhaps possible."—Nation, xii. 201.

9. The Prophet: a Tragedy, Bost., 1874, 16mo.

"He has written the tragedy of Mormonism, and taken Joe Smith and Brigham Young for his heroes. . . . He has changed the names of his personages, elaborated his plot, left certain details gracefully vague, and, for the most part, steered clear of local color. But his desire has been to adhere to reality as much as was practically convenient, and to enjoy whatever benefit there might be in leaving to his drama the savor of the soil. . . . It is impossible to deny that 'The Prophet' does not take hold of the imagination. It is the reverse of vulgar in conception, it is careful in execution, it has a dozen commendable qualities. . . . But it wants style, it lacks heat, it misses the nameless something which Sir Joshua Reynolds, in the anecdote, indicated by a snap of his fingers."—North American Review, (Henry James,) cxx. 188.

Taylor, Miss Elizabeth, d. 1879. 1. Blindpits: a Novel, Edin., 1868, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Anon.

"Decidedly 'Blindpits' is not a commonplace novel. Not only does its writer exhibit delicacy as well as power, but the story is characterized by tenderness and pathos, and enlivened by the perhaps rarer quality of humour."—Sat. Rev., xxvi. 597.

2. Quixstar: a Novel. By the Author of "Blindpits." Lon., 1873, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"The author has the same faculty which Mrs. Oliphant possesses of making a small circle engrossingly interesting, so that one does not mind the nearness and the definiteness of the horizon, but she does not resemble any other writer in her peculiar form of humour and the neatness with which she puts a situation or a problem."—Spectator, xlvi. 988.

"As a record, not without pathos, and, when regarded by modern eyes, a tinge of quaintness, of a lengthened, chequered, and industrious career, this book may well deserve, notwithstanding its length, a considerable share of the attention of those who, basking in the autumn sun of their lives, may care to take a sad but intensely real pleasure in reviewing portions of their own probably parallel careers in life."—Ath., No. 2268.

Taylor, Sir Henry, K.C.M.G., D.C.L., [ante, vol. iii., add.,] 1800–1886, b. at Bishop Middleham, Durham, Eng.; settled in London in 1823, and was for forty-eight years a clerk in the Colonial Office, declining in 1847 the post of permanent under-secretary, and retiring in 1872. In 1869 he was made a knight commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George for his distinguished services to the state and to literature. A collected edition of his works was published in 1878, 5 vols. 8vo. Add: 1. Autobiography of Henry Taylor, 1800–1875, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. 8vo. (Previously printed for private circulation, 1874–77.)

"There can be little doubt that Sir Henry Taylor's volumes will take a permanent place among similar contributions to a most interesting department of literature. They possess all the qualities which should entitle such a work to claim a lasting reputation."—Sat. Rev., lix. 478.

"It presents a series of studies in character drawn from the most eminent men and women of the last sixty years. Sir Henry Taylor's portraits of his great contemporaries are not hastily thrown off; though sometimes achieved in comparatively few lines, they are the result of careful and exact observation."—E. DOWDEN: Acad., xxvii. 267.

"The more stirring and cosmopolitan half of Sir Henry Taylor's career is dealt with in the first of his two volumes, which is, on that account, far more interesting than the second."—Ath., No. 2997.

2. Correspondence of Henry Taylor. Edited by Edward Dowden. Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"About two-thirds of the letters are from Taylor's own pen, and of the remainder about half were written by such friends of the inner circle as Miss Fenwick, Sir James Stephen, James Spedding, and Mr. Aubrey de Vere. The roll includes, besides, men of widely various pursuits, such as Mr. Gladstone, Earl Grey, the Poet-Laureate, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Venables among the living; and of the departed, Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Norton, Wordsworth, Southey, and Macaulay. Taylor's own letters are addressed to a still longer list of friends, and, while they do not exhibit him in any conspicuously new phase, they deepen the impression produced by the 'Autobiography,' and serve not a little to illustrate his character, tastes, and powers, and their limitations; especially, perhaps, their limitations."—Ath., No. 3155.

Taylor, Rev. Isaac, Litt. D., LL.D., [ante, vol. iii., add.,] b. 1829, at Stamford Rivers, Eng.; son of Isaac Taylor, LL.D., (q. v., ante, vol. iii.;) graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1853; ordained 1857; vicar of St. Matthias, Bethnal Green, 1865–69, and of Holy Trinity, Twickenham, 1869–75; since then rector of Settrington, Yorkshire; canon and prebendary of York Cathedral since 1885. The following list of his publications includes the only one mentioned ante, vol. iii.: 1. (Ed.) Charicles: Illustrations of the Private Life of the Ancient Greeks. By W. A. Becker. Lon., 1854, 8vo. 2. The Liturgy and the Dissenters, Lon., 1860, 8vo; 3d ed. same year. (This is erroneously included among the works of Canon Taylor's father, ante, vol. iii.) 3. "This work, however interesting in point of subject to a certain world of readers, is patchy and unsatisfactory."—Ath., No. 2073.

5. The Burden of the Poor: a Slight Sketch of a Poor District in the East End of London., Lon., 1867. 6. Etruscan Researches, Lon., 1874, 8vo.

"Mr. Taylor believes that Etruscan is a member of that Altaic (or, as he calls it, Ugric) class of Turanian which includes the languages of many tribes of Arctic Europe and Siberia, of the Turks and their kinsmen of Central Asia, of the Hungarians, and others. . . . The strongest argument . . . is that drawn from the tomb-building. . . . We do not think Mr. Taylor's linguistic evidence at present strong enough to confirm it. . . . If Corssen's philological evidence for an Italian origin will stand examination, the Ugric hypothesis must fall. But it is to our minds possible that no satisfactory linguistic proof will ever be drawn from such unsatisfactory materials."—Ath., No. 2428.

"From first to last its interest never flags; and the reader as he closes the book will feel that, even if Mr. Taylor's conclusions cannot in every instance be sustained, the conditions of the controversy have at the least been materially changed."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 661.

"As both the Semitic and Aryan keys have failed, he has tried a Turanian key. He has certainly turned his key once or twice, but the lock is not opened, and the reason why the key turned round at all was simply because it is very smooth and small and has very few wards. . . . Mr. Taylor, before attempting a task that has baffled the best scholars, has not even made himself acquainted with the simplest rules of Comparative Philology."—MAX MÜLLER: Acad., v. 372, 403.

See letter from Dr. Taylor in reply to this article, in Acad., v. 431.

"Mr. Taylor has fallen, over and over again, into the strange mistake of citing as Turkish (Turanian) words which are really either Arabic (Semitic) or Persian (Indo-European.) Every Orientalist knows that the Turkish of Constantinople is a composite language, like Hindustani, and that it has adopted a host of Arabic and Persian vocables of all kinds. Hence those who are not familiar with these other tongues must use Turkish vocabularies for philological purposes with great caution. How far Mr. Taylor's arguments are affected by this pervading error, it is easy to see."—WILLIAM WRIGHT: Ath., No. 2422.

See, also, the letter of Richard F. Burton in the same number of the Athenæum; that of Hyde Clarke in No. 2423; that of Lord Crawford and Balcarres in No. 2424; the reply to all these of Mr. Taylor in No. 2427; the rejoinder of Lord Crawford in No. 2430, and of Capt. Burton and Mr. Clarke in No. 2431, (Capt. Burton writes, "I hold the Mongoloid theory to be the book's one (ethnological) virtue, linked with a thousand (anthropological and linguistic) crimes;") the surrejoinder of Mr. Taylor, and a fresh attack on him by James S. Reid, in No. 2432; a letter in No. 2434 from S. Birch, (who writes, "Without disparaging the researches of Lord Crawford and Mr. Taylor, it may be premised that they have treated the subject as comparative philologists, and not approached it as archæologists or decipherers. The two persons most eminently qualified for this task, the late Mr. Edwin Norris and Dr. Hincks, are no more;") another letter from Mr. Taylor in No. 2436; a final note from Capt. Burton in No. 2438; and a letter from Mr. Taylor on Prof. Corssen's interpretation of the Etruscan epitaphs in No. 2495. 7. Greeks and Goths: a Study on the Runes, Lon., 1879, 8vo.

"His purpose is to show that the runic alphabets . . . must be traced to the alphabets of the Greek of the Egean and of the Hellenic colonies on the coasts of the Black Sea in the sixth and seventh centuries before the Christian era. . . . It must, we think, be allowed that the evidence, so far as it goes, is most cogent."—Sat. Rev., xlviii. 479.

"In no case does he critically refute any of the arguments of Dr. Wimmer, but he condemns them all most cavalierly. . . . On the whole, therefore, the question of the origin of the Runes remains where it was. The valuable portion of the book is the discourse on the Oghams."—Ath., No. 2696.

8. The Alphabet: an Account of the Origin and Development of Letters, Lon., 1883, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Dr. Taylor has spared no pains to make his work as thorough as possible. He has devoted many years to its composition, and has consulted innumerable monographs by specialists in every department of palæography, though we miss a few eminent names and cardinal works. He has had the advice and assistance of such scholars as Friedrich Müller, Euting, Burnell, Lenormant, and Stallebras, and especially of Professor Sayce, whose palæographic genius is traceable in many places. And Dr. Taylor has contrived to make his history of writing not only scholarly and sufficiently learned, but thoroughly clear and readable. . . . The first seventy pages, in which the primitive non-alphabetic scripts are discussed, are the least satisfactory in the book. Dr. Taylor is here clearly out of his depth."—Sat. Rev., lvi. 212.

One would really imagine in reading these enthusiastic pages that the writer had rediscovered the amiable Phæacians or had sojourned among the blameless Ethiopians. . . . His liberal views deserve consideration and will do good." —Ath., No. 3181.

MEADOWS, add.,] 1808–1876, b. in Liverpool, Eng.; went to India in 1824, and became an officer in the military service of the Nizam, but was afterwards transferred to civil duty, and in 1850 appointed administrator, during the minority of the Rajah, of the principality of Shorapore, which he governed with entire success during the difficult period of the Mutiny. He was afterwards appointed by the British government deputy commissioner of the western ceded districts of the Deccan. He retired in 1866. 1. Seeta, Lon., 1873, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

"Though harmonizing with its predecessors, it is far more complex, a higher flight of imagination, a more romantic study, and a more impressive compulsion of history to the novelist's purposes, because the history [that of the Mutiny] so compelled is near, solemn, and suggestive to us all."—Spectator, xlvi. 444.

2. The Story of my Life. Edited by his Daughter. Edin. and Lon., 1877, 2 vols.; new ed., 1878, 1 vol. p. 8vo.

"If anybody wants to know the arts by which a European can obtain ascendency over the native mind, let him study this autobiography and be informed."—Spectator, l. 1542.

"The leading facts of Colonel Taylor's life may be condensed into a small space. . . . How these simple materials can be turned into an attractive biography, the interest of which does not flag for two volumes, it may not be very easy for a critic to show. One reason, perhaps, is the clear, manly, and simple style in which the author tells the story of his life. Another may be found in the intimate familiarity with native manners, the generally sound estimate of native character, and the proofs of a legitimate and kindly ascendency over alien and subject races, which every page attests. In fact, there are some touches which remind us of the chivalry of Outram, and others which suggest the generosity and benevolence of Henry Lawrence. . . . Other men in the Indian services have written or edited readable books; others, who have never taken pen in hand, except to indite an official report, have civilized great kingdoms; but very few have exhibited the same combination of literary and official talent, and scarcely one, except in the earliest days of the Company, has, from such slender beginnings, made for himself a more enduring and honourable name."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 776.

3. A Noble Queen: a Romance of the Eastern Mutiny, Lon., 1878, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1880, 1 vol.

"The late Colonel Meadows Taylor had one surpassing gift as a writer of Indian romances. His intense sympathy with the people enables him to place their lives before the English reader in a familiar, human way that does more to dispel the common ignorance and arrogant assumption regarding the natives of India than all the formal histories that ever were written."—Spectator, li. 504.

"It is the great merit of his works that though they all convey instruction of no little educational value and a moral of incalculable importance, neither instruction nor moral is permitted to overlay the interest of the story."—Ath., No. 2360.

"It is a collection of a number of curious facts and instructive, if not very appropriate, quotations. But the consideration of the factory system is the last thing that it touches on. . . . The history closes just where the factory system begins."—Spectator, lx. 711.

"It merely aims at gathering up from divers sources and authorities what is known of past labour organizations, and tracing their influence upon the present."—Acad., xxx. 252.

"The importance of the book is largely as a contribution towards the solution of the great problems of the day."—Nation, xliv. 85.

Taylor, Richard, 1826–1879, only son of President Zachary Taylor, b. at New Orleans; graduated at Yale 1845; served in the Confederate army during the civil war, attaining the rank of lieutenant-general. Destruction and Reconstruction: Personal Experiences of the Late War, N. York, 1879, 8vo.

"This book is both useful and mischievous: useful, because every such contribution to the history of the time by an actor in it will be of more or less help in reaching just conclusions; and mischievous, because the writer has used to the utmost his influence with the people of the Southern States to teach contempt for popular government, worship for aristocracy, whether of rank or wealth, false notions of Northern society, dislike for all occupations except 'planting,' and a general belief that the triumph of the Government in the late war was the ruin of civilization on the continent. . . . His sketches of Lee, Joseph E. Johnston, Stonewall Jackson, and of several subordinate officers of different grades are discriminating, and seem to catch the salient outlines of character in a way to give liveliness and vitality to the picture."—Nation, xxviii. 287.

"In point of style and mode of illustration our author may well lay claim to independent workmanship. . . . The chief interest, however, of Mr. Taylor's book is due not so much to lucid exposition of physical science as to the intimate acquaintance of the author with the two sides of musical theory, the physical and the æsthetic."—*Sat. Temple, R. H. Diphtheria; 2d ed., Lon., 1879, 8vo.

Temple, Sir Richard, Bart., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., D.C.L., LL.D., b. 1828; was educated at Rugby School and Haileybury College; entered the Bengal civil service in 1846; served as private secretary to Sir John Lawrence in the Punjaub, and was afterwards appointed political resident at Hyderabad; financial member of the government of India 1868–74; lieutenant-governor of Bengal 1874–77; governor of Bombay 1877–80; created a baronet in 1876; M.P. for South Worcestershire since 1885. 1. India in 1880, Lon., 1881, 8vo; 2d ed. same year.

"A book in which the entire range of Indian administration is explored, and all the complicated structure of the various great State Departments satisfactorily explained, but which is, at the same time, from first to last a triumph of lucidity."—Sat. Rev., li. 152.

2. Men and Events of my Time in India, Lon., 1882, 8vo.

"Probably the weightiest contribution towards the history of India during the most critical period of its connection with England that has yet appeared."—Ath., No. 2836.

3. (Ed.) Asia: with Ethnological Appendix by Prof. A. H. Keane, (Stanford's "Compendium of Geography,") Lon., 1882, cr. 8vo; 2d ed., 1886. 4. Oriental Experience: Selection of Essays and Addresses. Maps and Illust. Lon., 1883, 8vo. 5. Cosmopolitan Essays, Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"In all these essays, which embrace countries so far apart as China, Greece, the Soudan, and North America, we may admit the presence, as claimed by the author himself, of 'one nexus, one guiding idea, one moral,—namely, that of British duty and responsibility in affairs which concern almost every part of the world.'"—Ath., No. 3054.

6. Journals kept in Hyderabad, Kashmir, Sikkim, and Nepal. Edited, with Introductions, by his Son, Richard Carnac Temple. Maps and Illust. Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The contents are varied: there is a 'private diary of politics at the court of the Nizam of Hyderabad;' there are journals of travel in Kashmir; and there are, finally, brief records of tours in Sikkim and the Eastern Himalayas. Each of these pieces is introduced by a useful essay from the pen of Sir Richard's son, Capt. Temple, of the Bengal Staff Corps. The 'journals' are all good, the most important by far being that first mentioned, which, indeed, forms more than three-fourths of the first volume."—Acad., xxxi. 443.

7. Palestine Illustrated, 1888, imp. 8vo.

"Sir Richard has given us thirty-two reproductions of pictures which, during his travels through Palestine, he painted on the spot in oil. . . . On the whole, his dashing experiment in colour has succeeded. . . . The prose setting of the sketches is clear and interesting."—Spectator, lxi. 792.

Temple, Capt. Richard Carnac, F.G.S., of the Bengal staff corps; b. 1850; eldest son of Sir Richard Temple, supra. 1. A Dissertation on the Proper Names of Punjâbîs: with Special Reference to Proper Names of Villages in the Eastern Punjâb, Bombay, 1883, 8vo. 2. The Legends of the Punjâb: vol. i., Lon., 1884.

"The contents of the present volume are for the most part in verse, the original texts being given in Roman characters, along with a literal translation. . . . Their principal value lies, not in their artistic expression, but in the insight which they convey into the thoughts and feelings of the hearers for whom they were composed."—W. R. S. RALSTON: Acad., xxvi. 114.

Tennant, Robert, b. 1828; M.P. for Leeds 1874–80; commissioner in Sardinia. Sardinia and its Resources. Map and Illust. Rome and Lon., 1885, r. 8vo.

"We are grateful to Mr. Tennant for his description of Sardinian antiquities, but it is in his account of Sardinia as it is that the merit of his book consists."—Sat. Rev., lxi. 820.

"We are not inclined to find fault, or to declare that his book is intellectually unnutritious, simply because here and there he has given us tinned geography when the carnal man might have preferred the fresh article. On the contrary, we do not know another English book which contains anything like so full or accurate an account of Sardinia, or, with the exception of Della Marmora's monumental tomes, of which Mr. Tennant seems to have made very little use, any foreign one worthy of being compared with it."—ROBERT BROWN. Acad., xxviii. 302.

Tennyson, Alfred, Baron Tennyson, D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., [ante, vol. iii., add.,] created a peer 1884. His position as the first of living poets still remains fixed; but his fame will no doubt rest chiefly on the works enumerated ante, vol. iii., although his later productions are all marked by the special characteristics of his genius. 1. The Window; or, The Songs of the Wrens: with Music by Arthur Sullivan, Lon., 1870, 4to.

2. Gareth and Lynette, [and The Last Tournament,] Lon., 1872, 12mo.

"The regret which may be justly felt at Mr. Tennyson's temporary abandonment of the metrical forms which delight the students of his earlier poems is faintly tempered by the inclusion in each of the Idyls of one short and finished lyric."—Sat. Rev., xxxiv. 568.

3. Idylls of the King, 1873, 2 vols. 8vo; 1874, 12mo. (This edition includes "Gareth and Lynette" and "The Last Tournament.")

"The fashion in which Mr. Tennyson has wrought the legends into a form suited to his purpose is a masterpiece of ingenuity. To attain a success of this kind is within the range of powers much less than his. There is, however, a way of doing commonplace work which elevates it into art."—Ath., No. 2348.

4. Queen Mary: a Drama, 1875–77, 12mo.

"Despite the many beauties which could hardly be absent in any work of Mr. Tennyson, the whole effect of 'Queen Mary' is disappointing, and the impression which it leaves upon the reader's mind is one of a dreary and bitter harshness."—Sat. Rev., xl. 19.

"It would be difficult . . . to adduce any sound reason for Mr. Tennyson's introducing so withered a leaf among the green leaves of his chaplet."—Ath., No. 2488.

5. Harold: a Drama, 1877, fp. 8vo.

"The poet has again fallen into what must be called the mistake of confounding the dramatic expression of tragic emotion with the mere relation of gloomy events."—Sat. Rev., xliii. 21.

6. The Lover's Tale, 1879, 12mo. (Written about 1828, and printed in 1833, but withdrawn from the press; subsequently "pirated" from imperfect proofs, and now published, with a third part, not previously printed, and a fourth, which had been published in 1869 under the title of "The Golden Supper.")

"The whole tone of the poem is pitched in that high key which the Elizabethan dramatists loved to select for their queens and tragedy-lovers. There is a fine extravagance about it, and its pages are flushed with that purple radiance whose fading is the first sign to us that we are no longer young."—E. W. GOSSE: Acad., xv. 489.

7. Ballads, and other Poems, 1880, 12mo. (Includes "Rizpah," "The Northern Cobbler," "The Defence of Lucknow," "The Voyage of Maeldune," &c.)

"The realistic element which gives so much of its force to Mr. Tennyson's genius is better represented in this little volume than the idealism which has hitherto been at least as powerful and at least as large a constituent of his greatest work."—Spectator, liii. 1624.

"In one of the poems of this volume Mr. Tennyson has, in our judgment, attained his highest reach as a poet dealing with the large issues of human life. It is called 'Rizpah;' and, although the heroine is an English peasant of the last century whose son had been gibbeted, the motif is identical with that of the beautiful Bible story. . . . It is impossible to read it without, as the poem goes on, being overwhelmed by a pity that is almost intolerable for the heroine of the poem. Having read it, it is impossible to recall it without a feeling of reverence for the great poet whose genius and deep heart called her into dramatic life."—Ath., No. 2771.

8. The Cup, and The Falcon, Lon., 1884, 12mo. (Two short dramas, which were acted, the first in 1881, and the second in 1882.)

"Despite several admirable passages of splendid rhetoric and glowing declamation, both 'The Cup' and 'The Falcon' are strangely deficient in vitality, in actuality, and in animation. It is unnecessary to add that they contain much poetic beauty, an exquisite felicity of language, and striking imagery."—Sat. Rev., lvii. 354.

9. Becket, Lon., 1884, p. 8vo.

"Though 'Becket' fails of the aim which its author would reach, it is a work which will sustain his fame as a writer of pure and nervous English, as a fine thinker, with a grand perception of what is noblest in character."—Sat. Rev., lviii. 757.

10. Tiresias, and other Poems, Lon., 1885, 12mo.
